A light was struck, and every portion of the wainscoting critically examined, but not one irregular surface could be detected, or any portion moved, and the next day was spent in as fruitless endeavors as the previous night. Here then, was a mystery. And when Pembroke considered it, he had no difficulty in deciding that his strange visitor was a human being, and had no doubt that it was some deep-laid plot to cause the desertion of the Dairy for some nefarious purpose, and he determined now to watch with zeal for the return of his midnight visitor, that he might bring him to a strict account. He confided his plans to none; upon himself he took all the danger, and providing himself with a good sword and an incomparable "Colt's patent," he felt himself quite able to meet and overcome any common adversary. Faithfully did he watch night after night—no re-appearance, until his haggard face began to attest how his loss of rest was injuring him; but still he was determined to keep his vigil. It was now nearly three weeks since the strange intrusion. A bitter cold night in November, snow had fallen during the day, and as Pembroke had taken a long walk before he dined, he felt unusually fatigued, and about twelve o'clock his head fell upon his arms, resting upon the round table in front of the fire in his room, and he slept soundly, very soundly from pure exhaustion. In about an hour he awoke suddenly with his hands upon his pistol, and there before him, right at his bedside, was the cloaked figure standing motionless. He was petrified. He raised his weapon—should he fire? No, not upon an unarmed man. He arose from the table, his form was quivering with excitement, his long, curling hair was in disorder around his handsome face. Still the figure stood like stone, his back towards the advancing Pembroke, and the long, dark cloak folded around him, while the light which was in the figure's hand played on the empty bed. So still, so quiet, surely this was not a human soul. Pembroke crept towards him like a tiger about to bound upon his prey, his fingers closing about the butt of his revolver with a nervous grip. He glanced upon the floor as he advanced—there was snow upon the carpet! Now he was sure he had a living man to deal with, he ground out these words beneath his set teeth, in angry excitement:

"Villain! I have you at last!"

Still almost motionless, the figure stood like a grim iron statue, if we except a shudder which ran through his frame, as Pembroke spoke; but instead of turning and confronting him, or flying, he moved quietly, slowly, away from the bedside, as softly and noiselessly as though wading through down. Pembroke fell back; he was awe-struck; there was something dreadful in all this. Slowly, mournfully the figure moved around that room, stopping at intervals and uttering such a deep, melancholy sigh, that it was grievous to hear it, so exquisitely sad it seemed, while Richard Pembroke, who a moment before was the furious man, was melted by such a tender sound of mournful heart-grief. Spellbound he watched the walker, as he approached more rapidly the side where he last disappeared. His pistol was now hanging in his nerveless grasp, down by his side, and the intruder might almost have struck him to the ground without resistance, so much was he affected by the strange power of this person and his movements. But now the dark-robed stranger had reached the portion of the room from which his last exit was made, the spring was pressed, the panels flew open, and in another instant the figure would pass through. But Pembroke seemed to recover his senses, he sprang forward rapidly, the pistol fell from his hand, and in falling the trigger was struck violently against the sharp edge of the iron fender, and a loud and deafening report followed. Pembroke had clutched the cloak, there was a shriek, and when the heavy cloak was dragged away, there, in the secret recess, stood Milly Gaybrooke!

But one instant did she look around her; she seemed with a woman's quickness to comprehend her position; her startled, terrified companion, his pale face blanched whiter as he gazed wonderingly at her, the cloak he held in his hand, the secret panel which led into what was formerly her own chamber, and now his—all, all burst upon her like a flash. She had been a somnambulist when a girl, had often wandered from her home, and into dangerous places. Now—heavens!—she had been walking in his chamber. These thoughts seemed to set her mad, her brain was in a whirl, for a moment her vision was clouded, and then with a faint, heart rending moan, she sank upon the cold slabs in the secret recess, swooning.

But now Pembroke understood all. In an instant he recognized the somnambulist, and she had scarcely fallen, ere he lifted her in his arms, and carried her into the room, chafing her hands and bathing her temples as tenderly and respectfully as though she was a dear sister, but O, how much dearer she was to him, as she lay cold and white before him. But when with sobs and hysterical tears she recovered from her swoon, he tenderly reassured her, and told her all. How he had watched, had heard the sounds, and saw the cloaked form, and how he supposed, she was so peculiarly organized, that since her misfortunes her mind would naturally be directed to her dear old home, and consequently to her own chamber, and how he hoped now that she would consent to be his own dear wife, and give him leave to love and cherish her always, as he had done from the moment he saw her sweet face at Walnut Ridge; and how she must not refuse him now through any false pride, for she must remember, too, how happy her dear old father would be to come and live again at the old place—and how—and how—

But the sobs were only of joy now, and the large brown eyes were full of grateful, happy tears, and the little plump, white hand reposed so trustingly in his large palm. And O, it was such happiness there by the warm firelight, in the stillness of the night, to find themselves so sweetly, unexpectedly beloved. But of course Richard T. Pembroke must see Milly Gaybrooke home right away, to Walnut Ridge (God bless it! That shall be the name of the whole farm), and of course, the long black cloak must be wrapped tightly round the sweet somnambulist, and of course Dick Pembroke's arm formed a proper band at the waist to keep it in place, and of course, of course— No matter what that sour bachelor neighbor Harry Marshall says—they form the dearest, best married couple in the country. And O, do go and see the quaint, old, historical house, and to find the way, be sure to inquire (if even twenty miles away) for Walnut Ridge.

THE WORD HUMBUG.

Among the many issues of base coin which, from time to time, were made in Ireland, there was none to be compared in worthlessness to that made by James II., at the Dublin Mint. It was composed of anything on which he could lay his hands, such as lead, pewter, copper and brass, and so low was its intrinsic value that twenty shillings of it was worth only two pence sterling. William III., a few days after the battle of Boyne, ordered that the crown piece and half-crown should be taken as one penny and one half-penny, respectively. The soft, mixed metal of which that worthless coin was composed, was known among the Irish as Uim bog, pronounced Oom bug, i. e., soft copper, i. e., worthless money; and in the course of their dealings the modern use of the word humbug took its rise, as in the per cent. phrase, "That's a piece of uimbug." "Don't think to pull off your uimbug on me." Hence the word humbug came to be applied to everything that had a spurious appearance, or which was, in reality, spurious. It is curious to note that the very opposite of humbug, i. e., false metal, is the word sterling, which is also taken from a term applied to the true coinage of Great Britain, as sterling coin, sterling worth, etc.—Notes and Queries.

ITALIAN PRISONS.

It is impossible for an Englishman to form an exact idea of what a prison in this country really is. In those horrible and filthy holes hundreds of human beings are placed, covered with rags and swarming with vermin. Besides disgusting soup and scarcely digestible pieces of meat, the government allows a bajocco a day—a fraction above one-half pence a day—to each prisoner. The jailor is permitted to keep a restaurant to which the prisoners can apply for provisions at ready money. This man, therefore, is the sole lawful purveyor of the prisoners, and can raise the price of provisions according to his pleasure. When I visited the local prison of Rimini, I saw two poor men, who were nearly starved to death. I asked one of them how he had come to such a condition, and he told me that he had sold his daily bajocco to the jailor for three months to come. The custode, who was then present, observed that the poor fellow being very fond of wine, had drunk his nine bajocchi all in one day. The half-starved prisoner made no more impression upon him than a starving rat would have done.—Correspondent of the London Times.

A WISH.

Mine be a cot beside the hill;
A beehive's hum shall soothe my ear;
A willow brook, that turns a mill,
With many a fall, shall linger near.—Roosa.

A FOX-HUNT.

BY WILLIAM S. LEGGISTON.

O'er field and marsh the "pack" are out
Before the hunters' eager rush;
Their baying nearly drowns the shout,
So wildly uttered, "For the brush!"

Madly dashing, daring leaping,
Ditches, fences, quickly over,
Starting foxes, lately sleeping,
From their dark and tangled cover.

In couples run the yelping hounds—
"In fault!" "He on!" The wind is fair.
"Again in view!" The whole pack bounds
In full cry now—they "double" here.

O'er hill and meadow, brake and beach,
Through "branch" and wood, wheat or clover,
The panting dogs their victims reach—
"Tally-ho!"—the "run" is over.

VOYAGE OF THE EVENING STAR.

BY MIRANDA M. ALLEN.

"So you're quite determined upon it, pet?"
The young girl addressed looked up from her embroidery with a bright smile.

"Quite, papa—that is, if you don't object!"

"Object? of course I object. I meant the ship should have your own name. 'Evening Star!' Romantic nonsense! If I hadn't supposed you would call her the Lizzie Gray, you shouldn't have christened her."

"Now, papa, I can't admire your taste.
Think how much prettier to name that splendid ship for the glorious evening star, than to call her after such a prosaic little body as I—Lizzie Gray!"

"Nonsense! the evening star can't hold a candle to you, Lizzie." *

The young girl laughed merrily.

"Think of the associations too, papa! When the ship comes in sight, it will recall Venus rising from the sea. And then I fancy it is a good omen. She will be under Neptune's especial protection. You know he was always friendly to Venus."

"Famous reasoning, that!"

"And O, papa, I can't bear to think of a ship having my name. Just fancy the Lizzie Gray reported off the Bermudas, laden with so many hogheads of molasses. It would mortify me to death."

"You're a silly little goose. But you can't cheat me, you rogue. You've some private and personal reason for wanting her called the Evening Star—you know you have. There's James, now—I'll ask him what it is. Don't blush, Lizzie. I sha'n't let you marry him, that's certain; and you wont run away from your old father—eh, child?"

There were steps heard upon the piazza just then, a tinkling of the door-bell, and presently a tall, fine-looking young man entered. Lizzie's cheeks grew rosier, as she gave him her hand, and somehow she managed to drop her ball of worsted; and what with her quick stooping to get it and James's anxiety to save her the trouble, their heads came together, there was a laugh from Captain Gray—and when Lizzie lifted her face again, she was rosier than ever.

"Upon my word, you've found out a new way of greeting each other. Where did you find the fashion, Lizzie?"

"James brought it home from foreign parts," replied Lizzie, rubbing her forehead.

"Well, well, it was a striking meeting," laughed her father. "James," he continued,
"what do you think? This girl refuses to name the ship Lizzie Gray, after her worshipful self, but goes wandering away among the planets.
Very vexatious, isn't it?"

"Why, yes, sir—perhaps so, if you had fixed upon a name. But since Lizzie was to christen it—"

"O, it's all right, of course. If she had chosen to call it the Flying Dutchman, it wasn't my business—only the deuce of it is that she didn't choose to call it Lizzie Gray."

"Why, papa, if you care so much—"

"I don't care much, child; you shall have your own way. And by the by, my way is towards the shipyard. So good morning to you—and mind you don't get sentimental!"

And the stalwart captain now strode away to look after the last touches now being given to the "Evening Star," and Lizzie and James were left alone together.

One would have said that the captain's departure had a very sobering effect, for Lizzie could not see to tell the scarlets from the crimsons for the tears that kept gathering; and whether from sympathy, or contagion, James's face assumed a very doleful expression. He drew a chair near her work-table, but he could not seem to say anything very consoling. It was only "Lizzie—dear Lizzie!"

"I don't know why it is, James," said Lizzie, brushing away the sparkling drops, "but somehow I feel strangely about the ship. I have never felt so about any of your other voyages."

"I think there is always something sad about the sailing of a new ship," said James, thoughtfully. "Always, in the midst of our most sanguine plans and preparations for the future, a sense of sad foreboding comes in to trouble us, and one feels it more in thinking of a vessel's first voyage—so many mysteries lie before her, so many possible dangers to be met. But, Lizzie, there are some reasons why we should both look forward to this voyage, or rather my return from it, with pleasure."

"I do look forward to your return," said Lizzie, smiling faintly. "But it is hard for my thoughts to leap over the intervening absence."

Now James would not voluntarily have made Lizzie cry, for the world; and yet I dare affirm that he was positively glad to see the great drops gather again. Somehow he was more successful in his efforts at consoling her this time, for presently Lizzie's own gay smiles chased away the tears, as the morning sunshine dissipates the dew.

"You must learn to be a famous little house-keeper, Lizzie, while I'm gone. Imagine a little cottage on the hill there, fronting the sea—the snugest, cosiest breakfast-room in the world, with your flowers in the window and the scent of heliotrope in the room—a dainty table charmingly spread—and, above all, a pretty little lady in pink wrapper pouring coffee!"

"O, James, what an imagination!" said Lizzie, looking shyly pleased. "Do you really fancy such things?"

"Indeed I do, and please God it shall not always be fancy, but one day a blessed reality. When I come home from this voyage, Lizzie, I shall speak to your father again. I shall have a right to do so, and for that matter I might now. My salary is adequate and my future promising, but perhaps it is best to wait." He hoped she would not assent so warmly.

"O, yes, I am sure it is, so that papa should not have any excuse for being unwilling. You'll be quite rich then, James—wont you?"

He looked smilingly into her blue eyes.

"Quite rich, Lizzie, if all goes well."

Are our young man and maiden getting sentimental? It is a pity that they should do so, after having been so kindly warned by the captain. It is, however, a vein into which young people are apt to fall, especially when they stand in such a relation to each other as James and Lizzie did—for they had been lovers almost since they were children. Certain it is that it was Lizzie who found a seat upon James's sled, whenever the roads were snowy and the way home from school seemed longer than usual. Sometimes he shyly conveyed a handful of chestnuts into her dinner-pail, or, with an audacity which surprised himself, gave her a ripe pear or a bunch of posies. You know that Cupid is an arrant rogue, and with cunning malice chooses the innocent and unsuspecting for his victims; so you can well imagine that when Lizzie and James grew up, they found themselves hopelessly fast in his toils. Not that James had even the least wish to escape them. He wore his chains very cheerfully—as why should he not, when they bound him to such a charming girl as Lizzie Gray? If you had seen Lizzie's home, you would never have thought to find so pretty a bird in it, for it was a wild, bleak-looking place—nothing but the tossing, moaning sea and the white beach in front, long ledges of rock on either side, and in the rear, wide fields arid and cheerless as coast lands usually are. It was apart from the town, too, and Lizzie had few companions and few amusements. There was reason enough for sadness and moping discontent, if Lizzie had not been gifted with as gay a temperament as ever a young maiden was heir to. You would recognize it in her sunny face all aglow with its gladness, in the twinkle of her blue eyes, and in the very wave and toss of her nut-brown curls that flirted with the summer airs in such joyous abandon.

This merry spirit kept her singing about the house all day long, just to let out the music that was in her; it made her the idol of James's heart, and the light of her father's eyes. It was inseparable from her beauty, for Lizzie had beauty—as what New England maiden has not? She bloomed in the dark, old house; and for one to meet her there unawares, was like finding a flower in a gloomy cavern. In the dreariest places on the wide earth—hidden caves damp and noisome, upon the mountain tops, in the green chambers of ocean, and even upon the shores of that frozen sea which in awful loneliness and strange, weird power, sobs around the poles—mosses green and fresh, lichens, and tender, pale blooms of many names, grow in their simple beauty; and thus, in the most unpromising corners, human beauty will blossom.

I don't know that Captain Gray appreciated his daughter fully; he probably wouldn't have understood the romance that nestled away in her heart, but he knew she was amiable and charming—and when he counted up the thousands he should give her, he was smitten by the wish of adorning them with other thousands. Never much given to sentiment, the brief period of his life when he wooed Lizzie's mother with as romantic professions of love as most people sometimes utter, had slipped out of his memory; and he did not see why Lizzie could not like a rich ship-master's son as well as her cousin James—an energetic, well-principled young man indeed, and toward whom the captain felt kindly as the nephew of his lost wife, but whose good qualities were not numerous or attractive enough to out-balance the substantial advantage of wealth. This was the captain's view of the matter, and it was that which most unromantic middle-aged people would have taken. Nevertheless, as a professed story-teller, I feel bound to protest against the captain's notions, and I quite approve of the course Lizzie and James pursued. Their relationship made it natural that they should meet often and familiarly; and you know that often, under pretence of knitting closer the ties of consanguinity, Cupid slyly manages to do a little business on his own behalf. The captain's ambitious views in regard to Lizzie were quite well known among his intimate acquaintances, even when she was a tiny maiden of three or four; and as she grew to womanhood, beautiful and winning, it was not to be supposed that he would relinquish his plans, and, therefore, when James modestly made known his affection for her, and besought the father's sanction, he was not much surprised, though a good deal grieved, to find his suit coolly waived as if it were a mere boyish freak.

"A very pretty fancy, my boy!" said the old captain, with provoking good humor. "Very natural, too—yes, very! But of course you see it won't do at all. Lizzie your wife! Ha, ha—a capital joke—a very pretty fancy! Excuse me, but it's really quite amusing. It is very fortunate you've such a sober old fellow as I to keep you right, else you might really carry this piece of nonsense to ridiculous lengths—yes, really. A capital joke, upon my word!"

Very provoking it was to James to be treated thus; but he was a cool-headed young man, and seeing it would do no good to get angry, wisely kept his temper. He resolutely set to work to win Lizzie by making himself her equal in a worldly point of view. Out at sea, when the storm roughened the waves, it was the thought of her that kept him cheerful and hopeful. He had made several successful voyages, going out as supercargo; and taking at the same time a personal interest in the speculation, he had accumulated a considerable sum—the more creditable to his ability since he had a mother and young brother to provide for out of his gains. When he came back from his last voyage, he had found a new ship building, whose principal owner was Captain Gray. Somewhat to James's surprise, he was offered a share in the vessel, and in the profits of her first cruise. He did not hesitate long—though it was a three years' absence which was before him, if he accepted, and hitherto he had been away not more than a twelvemonth; but if the absence was long, and a dreary interval lay between, a vision of so much happiness rose up on the other side, that he was tempted to consent. The lovers had fancied that the captain's offer was an indication of kinder dispositions towards James. Perhaps they would not have thought so, if they could have read his thoughts as he walked down to the shipyard on the morning of which we have spoken, throwing back his head and swaying from side to side as he went—for the captain belonged to the genus of marine animals, and having been caught late in life, had never been thoroughly acclimated on shore.

"That was a bright thought of mine," he chuckled to himself, "to send that fellow off for three years. If young Simonds don't cut him out, he's a spooney. I hope James will do well, too! Kindest thing I could do for him—not to let him tie himself down to a wife! Young folks never do know which side their bread is buttered on. Just the thing for me, too! That money of James's came just in time to prevent my taking up that last note. Confounded tight place I got in, there! Old Simonds's work, I'd wager; but I'll keep straight now." And the captain shook his head, as his great Newfoundland was wont to do upon coming out of the water.

The bright days of June saw the last touch put to the Evening Star—the captain and crew had been engaged—the ship launched and christened in presence of a numerous crowd of spectators, and in the full blaze of sunshine and beauty and festal attire. It was the largest and most costly vessel that had yet been built in the village of K—, and few of the coast towns of Maine had sent out nobler craft than that bleak village. Great had been the interest felt in the Evening Star by the good townspeople, and there was a feeling of personal pride in her successful completion. Most of the seamen, too, were natives of the village, the captain was the son of a prominent citizen, and it was natural that a sense of ownership in her should exist among the people.

In busy preparation the weeks slipped away, and at last one July day the Evening Star lay in the harbor, ready to spread her white wings and float away with the next tide. It was three o'clock in the afternoon, and James stepped upon the wharf, and making his way through the crowd of idlers which pressed around, took the path which led to Lizzie's home. It was his last visit upon shore, and the natural sadness of departure was heightened by an ominous foreboding which depressed his spirits, and which, strive as he would, he could not shake off. Three nights previous, a strange dream had come to James. He was not of an excitable temperament, or the prey of morbid fancies, and that this dream should make so vivid an impression upon him, surprised him even more than the dream itself.

In his sleep, he passed through all the incidents immediately preceding the departure of the Evening Star—he saw the canvass spread in the rosy glow of sunset, heard the cheery voices of the sailors as they caught the enthusiasm of putting out to sea, looked back at the crowd of eager faces upon the wharf, and further on at the white spires of the village churches and at the brown, weather-stained mansion where he knew Lizzie was grieving over his departure. He seemed to see the darkness thicken and night close in around the outward-bound ship; then he listened to all the familiar sounds upon ship-board—the creaking of cordage, the tramping of feet across the deck, and the orders of the captain. He had seen the sun go down in calm splendor, leaving a rich crimson in the west; and after sunset he had caught sight of a dark, vapory mass lying near the horizon. But he noticed it only slightly, and had not thought of a storm breaking the serene quiet of that summer night. Now, however, as in fancy he sailed away in the Evening Star, the wind began to blow up from the southwest and moaned in strange, inarticulate sobs through the shrouds. Rapidly the sky darkened, and a vast leaden sheet hung over the sea; the waves swelled, and black caverns opened as if to engulf them.

The wind increased, and the clouds were rent as by a hand of fire; higher swelled the waves, and fiercer blew the wind, when suddenly—O, awful sound!—the peculiar roar of the surf dashing against the rocks, indicating breakers not far away, startled him into the fearful sense of danger. He knew that a low, treacherous reef lay near the mouth of the bay—not always in sight, but occasionally at low tide appearing, rising above the water in a shape which had won for it, among the coastwise folk, the name of the Cat's Back. Many a goodly ship had been betrayed into ruin there. Was this to be the fate of the Evening Star? In the vivid phantasm which held him captive, the tableaux now succeeded each other with appalling swiftness. The hurried shouts of the captain, the superhuman endeavors to keep her off the reef, the wrenching asunder of timbers, the conquering waves, the shrieks of drowning men, the pale faces and uplifted hands seen by the lightning, passed in swift procession before his mental vision, and thrilled him with a terror that real danger had never roused. A blank, fearful darkness settled over the sea; it waited forth in long sobs that gave no hint of the dead who slept beneath.

The scene shifted; the Evening Star lay in her moorings, he stood upon her deck, when suddenly he seemed to be falling—falling down infinite distances—and with this undefined terror haunting his brain, he woke. Again and again had this dream visited him, precisely similar in every detail, and so real had it become, that it haunted him in his waking hours. It threw its gloom over the leave-taking—it invested the future with a terrible darkness.

He thought over all these things, as he went to take leave of Lizzie; and what wonder was it, if, when he stood at her door, his face should wear an expression of even deeper sadness than the thought of going would naturally write there. He heard her step in the passage—the door opened, and a sweet face met his, sad and pale. Another moment, and she lay sobbing in his arms. It was a sad, sad parting—and to James made doubly so by the ominous forebodings which he would not disclose to her. Just before he left her, Lizzie said:

"Do you know, James, why I wanted the ship named the Evening Star?"

"No, dear. Why was it?"

"You know I shall see the ship disappear in the southwest, and I liked to associate it with the beautiful planet that will rise over the sea, in that direction, all these autumn evenings that are coming. It will seem a happy omen."

He left her soon, and she was not one of those who thronged the quay to witness the departure, for the captain's house lay two miles away from the village.

The anchor was lifted. James stood upon deck, and there was shouting and waving of hats. Suddenly Captain Gray saw James pass from sight, and still gazing, the crowd presently observed an unusual commotion on board the vessel. A boat pulled off and neared the shore. Excited murmurs were heard in the throng. They pressed to the water's edge.

"What's the matter?" shouted Captain Gray.

"Mr. Sanford is injured, sir. He slipped in going down the cabin stairs, and fell with his head against a step."

James was carried, wounded and senseless, to his mother's cottage. The kindly neighbors thronged in—a physician was called.

Half an hour afterward, Captain Gray met Dr. Morley on the cottage steps.

"Well, doctor, will the lad recover? Is it a bad case?"

The doctor shook his head. "It might easily have been, but now I think we shall bring him round. He must be kept quiet, though. It will be a sad disappointment to the poor fellow, just on the eve of sailing."

"Ay! so I was thinking. The ship touches at Charleston; he might go on by land and join her there—eh, doctor?"

"Very likely, Captain Gray. We'll have him in sea-going order in a week or so, I dare say."

"There's no need of fretting Lizzie with this to-night," said the captain to himself, as he walked home. "She won't sleep a wink if I do. I'll go in and see how he is in the morning. Time enough then." And so the captain kept the accident to himself.

That night Lizzie sat upon the rocks and watched the white sails of the Evening Star grow rosy in the sunset light, and at last fade away in the distance. The night came down chill and dark. The incoming waves poured forth their eternal anthem to the silent stars that now began to shine out in the sky, and sad and weeping Lizzie rose up from her rocky seat to go home. She noticed that a black cloud lay close down by the horizon, and the wind blew up with a wild, evil sound. At home, in her safe nest, Lizzie could but listen to the wailing blasts which now grew louder and more fierce. Before midnight, the tempest burst in all its fury. That storm is still remembered as the most direful and terrible known on that coast for years. How can we describe the anxiety, the dread of the morning, the yearning sorrow, which thrilled the hearts of the villagers that night! Many a family had sent away its chief joy in the outward-bound ship, and many prayers beseeched the mercy of God from lips that seldom breathed forth supplications.

The agony of suspense was over with the night, and a fearful certainty settled down upon those who had wavered between hope and fear. The eager eyes that bent their gaze seaward could discover, lying high on that fatal reef, clearly seen in the morning sunlight, broken masts and fragments of timber—too sure signs of the ruin which the cruel sea had wrought. And with the tide came floating in the well-known tokens—a familiar garment, a chest-cover, or some recognized part of the sailor's outfit. At what time the Evening Star met her fate—whether the seamen clung to the ship, or took to the boats—what sufferings they endured, and how they braved them—the few, sad remains gave no sign, and the ocean kept the secret well. No idle babbling is the sea. Not in swelling tide or rushing waves does it boast its conquests, but hidden in its great bosom, it shall hold them till that day when all graves shall yield up their dead.

What is it that makes Captain Gray so pale, as he hurried towards his home? He has learned all that he can ever know of the fate of the ship he had so prided himself upon. Is it that alone which makes his face work so strangely, or is some bitter emotion awakened within him?

He goes straight to the sitting-room where Lizzie sits gazing out of the window with a wan, frightened face.

"James did not sail in the Evening Star, child. He was brought on shore because of an accident which occurred to him; but it was not serious, and this morning he is quite comfortable. Lizzie"—and the old man choked a little—"if you love each other, I will not put any more obstacles in your way. The hand of God is in this."

We will not follow our lovers further now. There was something too sacredly sweet in their re-union for words to touch. James went to sea no more. Further inland, where the soil is kinder, where the maize rustles in the summer breeze, and wild flowers grow, he made a home for his singing-bird.

It may be a strange tale that I have told you, but it is an "over true one."

TALE OF AN ELEPHANT.

Tell my grandchildren, said the late Right Rev. Daniel Wilson, writing home from India, that an elephant here had a disease in his eyes. For three days, he had been completely blind. His owner, an engineer officer, asked my dear Dr. Webb if he could do anything to relieve the poor animal. The doctor said he would try nitrate of silver, which was a remedy commonly applied to similar diseases in the human eye. The huge animal was ordered to lie down, and at first, on the application of the remedy, raised a most extraordinary roar at the acute pain which it occasioned. The effect, however, was wonderful. The eye was in a manner restored, and the animal could partially see. The next day, when he was brought, and heard the doctor's voice, he laid down of himself, placed his enormous head on one side, curled up his trunk, drew in his breath just like a man about to endure an operation, gave a sigh of relief when it was over, and, then, by trunk and gestures, evidently wished to express his gratitude. What sagacity! What a lesson to us of patience!—Sketches from India.

UNCHANGING LOVE.

O, the heart that has truly loved ne'er forgets,
But as truly loves on to the close;
As the sun-flower turns on her god, when he sets,
The same look which she turned when he rose.

CASSAME.—A SONG.

BY MRS. S. F. HADDOCK.

Softly on the evening air
Falls the low, sweet melody
Of the wood-dove sitting there
By the grave of Cassame.

O'er the little grassy mound
Droops the mourning willow-tree;
And the gentle flowers around
Weep for lovely Cassame.

From the distant rocky shore,
List, the moaning of the sea!
'Tis for her who comes no more—
'Tis a dirge for Cassame.

E'en the wind-harp 'mong the trees,
Whose best song is wild and free,
Sadly bids the wandering breeze
Wail for sweet, lost Cassame.

Sing on—moan, and wail, and weep.
Bird, and wind, and solemn sea!
Wanders up among the stars,
Spirit of lost Cassame.

Purer, holier, or more bright,
Other angels cannot be,
Than that one in heaven to-night,
Whose sweet name is Cassame!

THE LAND PIRATE.

BY CLAUDE ROSSITEUR.

It was in the summer of 1844, that the events described in this narrative occurred. I was on my way from Cincinnati to New Orleans, in the Crescent City—long since gone to decay. My business in the latter city was to draw up a will, and transact other necessary business for a friend of mine, a New Orleans planter, who, finding himself in declining health, had sent for me, with the promise of abundant pecuniary recompense for my services.

At that time the whole country was ringing with accounts of the bold deeds and daring outrages of the famous land pirate John Murrell, and his gang of cut-throat vagabonds. Various exaggerated reports were afloat respecting his redoubtable band, as also of his own appearance; one account representing him as a big, burly fellow, with fiery red hair and strength enough to hold a mad bull by the horns; another, as a small, slight, but active and powerful man; while a third, differing from both the others, ascribed to him the olive cheek, the raven hair, and the fierce, vindictive temperament of the haughty Spaniard.

Among the passengers on board the steamer was one with whom I soon formed a most agreeable acquaintance. Of fascinating address, Monsieur Breteuil—for so he christened himself—was as agreeable a man as it was ever my fortune to meet. One evening, as we leisurely paced arm-in-arm up and down the promenade deck, inhaling the perfume of a couple of choice Havanas, I mentioned the various reports of Murrell's personal appearance, which I had heard. When I had finished, he threw away the remnant of his cigar, laughed pleasantly, and said:

"All of those accounts are exaggerated or untrue. I once saw Murrell!"

"You!" I exclaimed; "how, when, where?"

"On my plantation, a few miles south of Memphis, though he seldom ventures so far South, as his head quarters are said to be in Northern Tennessee. Well, as I was saying, he came to my plantation, attracted thither by the report of one of his spies, that I had several thousand dollars at that time, for which I had no particular use, as the robber chief informed me in the course of a confidential conversation which took place at the time, respecting the quantity of filthy lucre which I was supposed to have in my possession. I will not give a detailed account of the robbery, but will proceed to describe Murrell, as he then appeared. He is tall, well-proportioned and muscular, with black eyes, brown hair, and a dark complexion, and must be about thirty-five years of age."—By the way, an excellent description of himself in all points, except his hair, which was black and curling.

"Why," said I, laughing, "you make up so strong a case against yourself, that I am almost tempted to call an officer at the next landing, and have you arrested for robbery, murder, and other high crimes and misdemeanors."

"Nonsense!" said he. But I fancied he looked startled, as he spoke. "Come," he added, "let's go into the cabin; the night-air is chilly, and I have a headache."

I consented to his proposition, and we accordingly repaired to our state-room; when Breteuil, complaining of indisposition, soon retired. I immediately followed his example, and was clasped in the arms of the drowsy god. In my dreams that night (I always dream), the forms and names of Breteuil and Murrell were strangely commingled; and it was a relief to me when I awoke about midnight, and found myself in my berth, with the night lamp burning dimly overhead. As I lay, debating inwardly, whether I should remain where I was, or go on deck and enjoy the beautiful moonlight, a faint groan smote upon my ear, apparently coming from the berth of my friend, followed by the exclamation ;

 "Some water, Marston—for heaven's sake, some water !"

I was quickly on my feet, and by his side with a glass of water, which he drank eagerly. His face was flushed, his breath labored and painful, coming in short, quick gasps, and before day-break, he was in a raging fever. When the doctor of the boat was called in, he shook his head mournfully, and declaring it to be a severe case of intermittent fever, advised his being taken on shore at the next landing. With good care and nursing he (the doctor) felt assured that the patient would recover; without it he must most certainly die. I did not hesitate to take his advice, which was proffered with an air of candor and sympathy. And a rude but comfortable litter was immediately constructed, covered with cloaks, blankets and pillows, upon which the sick man was placed, and carried ashore by strong and willing hands.

I procured the best accommodations the boat afforded, and installed myself head nurse. It were needless to recount the incidents of his illness, even if I had space or inclination, which I have not. Therefore suffice it to say, that the naturally strong constitution of my patient eventually triumphed over disease, though not until after an illness of several weeks. His gratitude to me was unbounded, and expressed in the warmest manner. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered to travel, we took the boat for Memphis, where we parted—I continuing on my way, while he went, as he said, to his plantation, inviting me to visit him on my return, which request I assured him I should be most happy to avail myself of.

I reached New Orleans, transacted my friend's business, and after a stay of a fortnight, started for home with a light heart and heavy pocket. I arrived safely at Memphis, and then, remembering my promise to visit Monsieur Breteuil, I hired a horse and set out for his plantation. It was a fine, though rather sultry, day in August, the merry "Month of Sheaves," and my spirits rose, as I gazed on the fine country through which I was passing. I had rode several miles, and began to think I must be somewhere in the vicinity of my friend's plantation, when, as I entered a tract of land thickly covered with a large growth of underbrush, I was startled by the words :

"Your money, or your life!" uttered in a hoarse, menacing tone.

At the same moment a tall fierce-looking man stepped forth from his concealment, and seized my horse by the rein, while two more presented themselves, each holding in his hands a rather ugly-looking "persuader," cocked and ready for instant service.

Now I am not a coward, and having a considerable amount of money about my person, I determined to make, at least, an effort for the preservation of both life and property. Accordingly I drew forth a pistol, and knocking down the fellow at my bridle-rein with the butt, I spurred my horse forward, and levelling the weapon at the nearest ruffian, I pulled the trigger. The villain dropped to the earth with a groan and a curse, at the same moment that a couple of bullets whistled by my head; but before I could draw my second weapon, half a dozen more surrounded me. I was dragged from my horse, fierce faces were over and around me, and I thought it was "all up" with poor me; therefore I began casting up that mental balance of good and evil deeds, which every man is supposed to form when about to die, and finding that the evil predominated over the good at an alarming rate, determined to make one more desperate effort for the regaining of my lost freedom. The man who had been prostrated by the blow from the butt of my pistol, had, by this time, recovered his senses, and now strode savagely to the place where I sat surrounded by my captors, his hand upon the hilt of a knife which peeped from his bosom, and with a look of most determined hostility on his swarthy face, down which the blood trickled from his bruised forehead. As the reader may well conjecture, my position was none of the most enviable, surrounded by men who would not have scrupled at shedding my blood under ordinary circumstances; but having wounded two of their number, my situation was perilous in the extreme. Already were red hands uplifted against my life; already bright knives were glancing in the sunlight. I made a desperate effort to break from the grasp of the strong hands that held me. It was fruitless; and so, commending my soul to the mercy of Heaven, awaited the fatal stroke, when—"The man who strikes a blow, dies!" came in loud and authoritative tones.

The men who held me loosened their grasp, and I leaped to my feet, and gazed around in search of the owner of the voice, which I thought I had recognized. Finally, my roving glance fell on his form. I uttered an exclamation of surprise, and sprang forward with the cry :

"Great Heaven! Monsieur Breteuil, do I see you here?" on my lips, at the same moment seizing his hand.

"Not Monsieur Breteuil, but John Murrell!"

he replied, with a burning cheek. Then turning to his men, he continued: "My men, it is my wish that you leave us alone. This man is my friend. Pick up poor Brady and carry him to the cave, where I myself will soon join you."

He waved his hand, and the men sullenly obeyed, casting hostile glances at me as they withdrew.

"And now," he said, when we were alone, "how is it that I find you here?"

"I might with propriety ask you the same question," I replied; "however, I will satisfy your curiosity. I was, when stopped by your cut-throats, on my way to the plantation of one Breteuil, who is said to reside in these parts! And now, having answered your question, may I take the liberty to propound a similar one, and to inquire what brought you here?"

"Why, my vocation, of course," he replied, with a merry laugh. "I heard from one of my spies that a well-dressed individual was approaching on horseback and sallied forth to give him a surprise; but the surprier was in this instance surprised. I felt a strange aversion to presenting myself, and gave the business into the hands of my lieutenant. The sound of pistol-shots recalled me from the painful reverie into which I had fallen, and I hurried forward, intending to command your release. I reached the margin of the road just as my men were raising their knives to strike, and was petrified with astonishment when I beheld your face. You know the rest—and more," he added, his voice taking a lower, softer intonation as he spoke,—"you know that my everlasting gratitude is yours, for your generous and self-denying care of me when incapable of caring for myself."

He continued: "The description I gave you of the famous robber was correct,"—taking off his hat as he spoke, and disclosing a head covered with brown hair. "I had assumed that disguise in order to avert suspicion. There was, on board the Crescent City, a large amount of money and plate, which I had determined to obtain possession of, at any risk. My plot was in a fair way for succeeding, when it was prevented by that unlucky fever, through which you nursed me so tenderly. Here we part, probably forever; but first accept this ring," holding out to me a glittering circlet of diamonds. Then, seeing me hesitate, he said, while a look of pain crossed his features: "Take it; I came honestly by it; it was my mother's."

A tear trembled on his dark lashes as he spoke, and dropped upon his bronzed cheek. The mention of that name "mother" had stirred the fountains of his soul, and the strong man wept.

I urged him earnestly, as I took the ring, to abandon his present way of life. But he replied, while a sad smile broke over his countenance—a smile such as a fallen angel might have given as he gazed once more on paradise:

"No, my friend; it is impossible. I am too far gone. There is no redemption, no turning back for me. Farewell, my friend, may God bless you!"

He wrung my hand and was gone! Gone, while I stood gazing after him like one in a dream! I mounted my horse, and rode slowly and sadly back to the city, thinking sorrowfully of this man whose splendid talents might have raised him to stations of power and honor; but which, prostituted to the lowest, basest purposes, would probably bring him to the gallows.

I never saw him but once since. I was being shown by the warden over the Tennessee State Prison, several years afterwards, when, on reaching the workroom, I saw a face with melancholy black eyes, which brought back the memory of other days. His glance encountered my own, he started, turned pale and red by turns; and respecting his grief and shame, I was about to withdraw my earnest gaze, when the warden, mistaking my emotion for curiosity, said:

"That, sir, is the famous land-pirate, robber and murderer, once the terror of Tennessee—John A. Murrell!"

I turned and left the prison with a saddened heart.

CHURCH BELLS.

There is something beautiful in the church-bells—beautiful and hopeful; they talk to high and low, rich and poor in the same voice; there is a sound in them that should scare pride, and envy and meanness of all sorts from the heart of man; that should make the earth seem to him, at least for a time, a holy place. There is a preacher in every belfry, that cries, "Poor, weary, struggling, fighting creatures—poor human things! take rest, be quiet. Forget your vanities, your follies, your weekday craft, your heart-burnings! And you, ye human vessels, gilt and painted, believe the iron tongue that tells ye ye are of the same Adam's earth with the beggar at your gates. Come away, come!" cries the church-bell, "and learn to be humble—learning that, however daubed and stained, stuck about with jewels, you are but grave clay. Come, Dives, and be taught that all your glory, as you wear it, is not half so beautiful in the eye of Heaven as the sores of uncomplaining Lazarus! And ye, poor creatures, livid and faint—stinted and crushed by the pride and hardness of the world—come, come," cries the bell, with the voice of an angel, "come and learn what is laid up for ye!—and learning, take heart, and walk among the wickedness, the cruelties of the world, calmly as Daniel walked among the lions."—Douglas Jerrold.

The Florist.

No sooner has the cold withdrawn,
Than the bright elm is tufted on the lawn;
The merry sap has run up in the bowers,
And burst the windows of the buds in flowers;
With song the bosoms of the birds run o'er—
The cuckoo calls, the swallow's at the door;
And apple-trees at noon with bees alive.
Burn with the golden chorus of the hive.

LUCAS HUNT.

Requisites of Flower Culture.

It is well known that plants absorb their nutriment by the roots, and this nutriment is conveyed through the stem to the leaves, when it is subjected to a process by which a large proportion of water is discharged—the rest is submitted to the action of the atmosphere, and carbonic acid is first generated and then decomposed by the action of light. Carbon is now under the form of a nutritive material, which is conveyed back into the system of the plant for the development of all parts of the structure, and a proportion of the secreted matter is afterwards ejected from the plant. This excrementitious matter does not injure the plants of other species to any considerable degree; but it soon renders the soil unfit for the culture of plants of the same species, which will deteriorate if cultivated above three or four years in the same spot. Flowers therefore require, in order for their successful culture, not only a change of soil, but that it be refreshed with proper moisture. One great point also to be observed in rearing flowers is, not to overload them with rich or watery food, or they will abound in leaves, while the number of blossoms will be scanty. They must have plenty of light till full-blown, after which they should be carefully shaded so as to preserve their colors, and prolong the season of bloom.

The Chrysanthemum.

The chrysanthemum has of late quite divided popularity with the dahlia, because it is easily grown, blooms when there is little else to make a show, and is not easily affected by frost. These should be obtained now in pots, and if the garden is already occupied, put them in larger pots, that they may grow unchecked until the period arrives for planting them. This is generally when some of the annuals are going off and are removed; then the chrysanthemums may be turned out of their pots into the open ground, for they are handsome in foliage before they bloom. Let it be understood, if there is room to plant them, that the sooner they are in the ground the stronger they will grow; but the tops must be pinched off as they grow up every fortnight till the last week in July.

Seedling Geraniums.

The French amateur florists are remarkably successful in the production of new seedlings of some classes of flowers. For years the old scarlet geraniums have been grown, without showing any remarkable or distinct new colors, being chiefly various shades of scarlet or pink; the French, however, have within a short time past raised some quite new sorts. Among the recent sorts are the Rubens, a rosy crimson, and the Damage, an exquisite shade of salmon pink. There are also the Nemesis and Consuello; the former a delicate shade of pink, with large white centre and an immense truss; the Consuello a rosy scarlet.

Treatment of Evergreens.

The distribution of evergreen trees and shrubs is among the most interesting operations in the formation of garden grounds and their improvement. They give at once a clothed appearance to what was bare ground; and also, by their change of position, they effect an almost entire alteration in the aspect of the place. In all cases, it is advisable that the ground should be well drained and trenched; and where poor, it should be enriched with fresh soil or manure, or both, especially when the shrubs are young and small. Light sandy soils are greatly improved by moderate additions of clayey loam or peat earth. In transplanting shrubs of considerable size, it is preferable to put the enriched soil or manure close around and in contact with the young fibres. As many roots as possible should be preserved in lifting evergreen shrubs for transplantation. When they are large, or a little above the size usually procured, they should have large balls—and it will be proper to reduce the head of the tree, as otherwise the branches will die from their inability to support their former amount of foliage.

Requisites of a perfect Dahlia.

For a perfect dahlia the general form should be that of about two-thirds of a sphere or globe. The rows of petals forming this globe should describe unbroken circles, lying over each other with evenness and regularity, and gradually diminishing until they approach the top. The petals composing each succeeding row should be spirally arranged and alternate, like the scales in a fir-cone, thereby concealing the joints, and making the circle more complete. The petals should be broad at the ends, perfectly free from notch or indentation of any kind, firm in substance, and smooth in texture. They should be bold and free, and gently cup, but never eart or quill, or show the under sides.

Flower-Garden Soils.

The operation of digging is the most efficient method of moving the soil of the flower-garden. Although tiresome as well as disagreeable to an inexperienced person, a little practice makes it comparatively easy, so that in a moderate degree it may be done with facility, even by a lady. In digging for immediate planting or sowing, pains must be taken to break the lumps, and reduce the soil to what is called a fine tilth. All stones should, of course, be carefully removed, as well as all other undesirable substances—and this can only be thoroughly done when the soil has been well pulverized.

Trapa.

Water caltrops. Aquatic plants, natives of Europe and the East Indies, with white flowers and very curious nuts, which, when cooked, resemble in taste those of the chestnut, and are equally wholesome. The rhizome should be planted, or the seeds sown, in loamy soil, at the bottom of the water in which the plant is to grow.

Helenium.

The species are generally tall-growing perennial plants, with large yellow flowers. They are increased by dividing the roots. There are two or three annual species which are quite hardy, and only require sowing in the open border. The handsomest of these is Heicium quadridentum, which has bright orange-colored flowers like a rendbechia.

Tacamahac.

The Indian name for the Balsam Poplar; a species that should be cultivated in ornamental plantations for the beautiful yellowish green of its leaves, which appear very early in the spring.

Curious Matters.

The Milk Tree.

In a narrative of travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro, just published, Mr. Wallace describes an extraordinary tree called the milk tree, which was one of the first wonders he saw near Para. The fruit is edible, and full of a rich and very juicy pulp; but strangest of all is the vegetable milk, which exudes in abundance when the bark is cut. It has about the consistence of thick cream, and but for a very slight peculiar taste, could scarcely be distinguished from the genuine produce of the cow. From some logs that had lain nearly a month in the yard, several notches were cut with an axe, and in a minute the rich sap was running out in great quantities. It was collected in a basin, diluted with water, strained and brought home at tea time and at breakfast next morning. The peculiar flavor of the milk seemed rather to improve the quality of the tea, and give it as good a color as rich cream; in coffee it is equally good. The milk is also used for glue, and it is said to be as durable as that used by carpenters.

An Infernal Machine.

Senor Gonzales de Candamo, owner of the railroad from Lima to Callao, received a note from an anonymous source demanding a thousand dollars, telling him he should do so on a certain day, if the money was not forthcoming. Candamo, who loves money better than his life, paid no attention to the threat. On the day designated a man entered his fine house with a box under his arm, and was making his way up stairs to Senor G.'s room, when he accidentally dropped the box. An explosion followed, doing a good deal of damage to the house, but no one was injured.

Strange Discovery.

Wonders are the order of the day. In the stomach of a dead cow at Double Springs, Kentucky, were found eighty-two balls of hair, varying in size from four to ten inches. They were almost round, hard, and perfectly compact. For a number of years past, during the hog slaughtering season, the hair had been purchased and spread on the ground to dry. Where this hair was spread last season, the grass grew up in the spring. The cow, in eating the grass, must have swallowed the hair, forming the various balls.

A Dog with a wooden Leg.

Mr. Robert Howard, landlord of the Railway Inn, near the Droylsden Railway Station, England, has in his possession a Scotch terrier with a wooden leg, which runs about with scarcely a perceptible limp. The dog had its right forefoot amputated by an express train some time ago, and a veterinary surgeon from Manchester, being informed that it was a favorite pet, not only dressed its wounds, but shortly afterwards supplied it with an artificial limb, of which it appears somewhat proud.

An unwelcome Tenant.

A man named Job Sneath, who lives near Fostoria, Pa., while harvesting one day, lately, was taken suddenly ill, and during the evening vomited up a live lizard over four inches in length. He has no idea when and in what manner it got into his stomach, but he has been in bad health for several months. Similar instances have been recorded before of such occurrences, which have proved fatal, or have been attended with protracted sickness and suffering.

Herculeans above Ground.

Five ancient cities, deserted and forgotten, have been discovered in the Great Desert, beyond the river Jordan. A report made to the Royal Asiatic Society, by Mr. Graham, an Englishman lately returned from travels in the East, gives the particulars of the discovery.—“They were as perfect as if the inhabitants had just left them—the houses retaining the massive stone doors, which are a characteristic of the architecture of that region. One of the cities is remarkable for a large building like a castle, built of white stone, beautifully cut. Further eastward other places were found where every stone had inscriptions in an unknown character, bearing some apparent likeness to the Greek alphabet, but probably referable to the Hamyaritic alphabet, formerly in use in Southern Arabia.”

A wonderful Ape.

A vigorous specimen of the ape family called cynocephalus, or dog-headed, has been presented to the zoological gardens at Menzies by a skipper. The animal is said to be prodigiously strong, and equally savage. He made desperate efforts to seize some of the sailors, to whom he had a dislike, and a very strong iron chain was necessary to restrain him. They were even obliged to saw off some of his canine teeth. His appearance is very odd, the head being exceedingly long, the muzzle occupying two-thirds of the whole, the eyelids flesh-colored, the limbs elongated and slender, and the tail the same dimensions as the body. He is beginning to behave himself respectably now, but at first he was extremely fierce and sulky.

An old Umbrella.

The Hartford Courant says:—An umbrella, at least fifty years old, in perfect repair, and worth a dozen of our modern umbrellas, was left in our office some time ago by a gentleman who inherited it from his sister, who carried it for fifty years, and dying at the age of eighty-two, left it as an heir-loom to her brother. The old gentleman, forgetting that he had been in the counting-room, searched everywhere that he could think of for his lost relic in vain. He was delighted the other day on dropping in to look over the exchanges, to see his old friend, the umbrella, quietly awaiting him.

Natural Wonder.

A beautiful limestone cave, embracing a number of fine chambers, glittering with stalactites, has been discovered near the town of Placer, in El Dorado county, California. One chamber is one hundred feet long by thirty feet wide. At one end there is a magnificent pulpit in the gothic style. It is completed with the most beautiful drapery of alabaster striae of all colors, varying from white to pink-red, all overhanging the beholder. Immediately under the pulpit there is a beautiful lake of water. Another chamber, still more splendid, measures two hundred by one hundred feet.

Curious Circumstance.

Recently, a bird belonging to a lady of Buffalo, as it was flying around the room, happened to pick up a hair, and flying with it to its cage, commenced some evolutions with it, as though it were about laying the foundation of a nest. By-and-by the hair became entangled in its legs, and flying around the cage, it got over the perch and then around its neck. The lady, after some time observing that the usually musical little pet was silent, went to the cage, and there found the little warbler actually suspended by the neck from its perch, and almost in the agonies of death.

Remarkable Accident.

One of the most terrible accidents that has ever happened through the agency of crinoline occurred, lately, in one of the English ports on board the Royal Albert, a vessel of the British navy. One afternoon, while the decks were thronged with visitors, the dress of a lady, in passing one of the signal guns, caught the percussion-hammer, and brought it over upon the face. The gun, which was loaded with blank cartridge, went off, and one of the crew, who unfortunately was either standing in front of the gun, or had been working about it, had his arm blown off close to the shoulder. The sad event caused much consternation as well as regret among the visitors, and the lady who had unwittingly been its cause fainted.

Singular Death.

Mrs. Caroline E. Capen, of Stoughton, died from a very singular cause, recently. She had spent the evening at her sister's house, about three-quarters of a mile from her own residence, and started for home alone, declining to trouble any one to go with her. After nearly reaching home, a dog suddenly sprang up close to her, barking furiously, at which she was very much frightened, causing a rupture and sudden hemorrhage, accompanied by a violent coughing, and after proceeding a few steps she sank down exhausted. Some one passing discovered her, and she was carried home, where about two hours after she died. She was a healthy woman, aged about twenty-two years.

Eccentric Will.

In a will drawn up by the late Count Stephen Szechenyi, in 1833, is the following passage:—"I wish my body, if possible, to be taken to England, in a country in which I have learned so much, in order that it may there be dissected. My reason for wishing this is, that my example may tend to diminish the dislike which is felt by the English to the dissection of the bodies of their relatives." In a will drawn up in 1841, Szechenyi expresses a hope that if ever a Walhalla should be constructed in Hungary, its founders will give his remains a place in it, as a reward "for his good intentions" toward the land which gave him birth.

A natural Curiosity.

In Greene county, Virginia, there is a remarkable natural curiosity, known as the "Tidal Spring." The water issues out of the ground in a bold stream sufficiently strong to turn a small grist-mill, and it continues to flow for fifteen or twenty minutes, when the water ceases to run, and in two minutes' time not a solitary drop of water is visible. In the course of an hour or two the water commences flowing again, and flows twenty or thirty minutes, when it again ceases. In wet weather it flows every hour, and in dry weather it flows about seven or eight times every twenty-four hours.

A Father's Legacy in 1546.

In the will of Robert Dunkinfield, of Dunkinfield, dated March 23, 1546, is the following passage:—"I give unto William Dunkinfield, my son and heir, my great two-edged sword and my less two-edged sword, which I do wear myself, with my great new buckler, and my short arming sword, with my dagger which is garnished with silver, and also my battle-axe, with all other harness belonging to my body; and I will that my executors shall deliver all to him at such time as he shall be able to have the governance of the same himself."

A rare Curiosity.

A specimen of the aerolite stones which fell in Summit county, Ohio, recently, has been exhibited at Pittsburg. It is the largest one that fell, and is almost indescribable as to shape, being so irregular; but we should call it a quintessence. Its weight is one hundred and three pounds. It contains a considerable quantity of sulphurates of iron and some nickel. Very many of these stones fell during the said shower, yet no one was injured. The one of which we are writing was seen to fall, but so buried itself that it was with considerable difficulty found. We presume it will be taken to the Smithsonian, or some other scientific institute. A professor of Yale is making such examination of these stones as he thinks will enable him to tell whence they fall.

A Wonder.

Thomas Hall, a linen-weaver in Ireland, has finished a shirt entirely in the loom. It is woven throughout without seams, and very accurately and neatly gathered at the neck, shoulders and wrists. The neck and wristbands are doubled and stitched, there is a regular selvage on each side of the breast, and where stitching ordinarily is, so it is in this shirt. In short, it is as perfectly finished as if made by an expert needlewoman. This shirt has been exhibited to several persons in the linen trade, who are completely satisfied that it is actually the production of the loom, without any assistance of the needle.

Mammoth Cave in California.

A letter dated Negro Hill, California, on the 16th ult., and published in the Sacramento Standard, explains in detail the discovery of a mammoth cave in Eldorado county. While a party of men were excavating for a lime kiln, they broke through into a cave of immense size: Mayor Swan, of Sacramento, subsequently explored it for two hours, and visited several large rooms of several hundred feet in length, by nearly as many broad, until he was brought to a halt by a lake, the extent of which is as yet unknown. The floor, as well as stalactites, are all of a beautiful crystallized white marble.

Desperate Bet.

A young man, who works in the coal mines of Gill, near Charleot, lately made a bet of a few glasses of beer, that he would lie down on the railway and let a train pass over him. He performed his mad freak, placing himself lengthways in the middle of the line between the rails, making himself as small as possible. He won his bet, but at the expense of a severe burn on the back of his neck, from a piece of lighted coke falling on him.

Singular Shower.

Recently a remarkable shower of frogs took place at or near Port Jervis. At Troy, lately, during a rain-storm, there was a shower of stones, averaging from about half the size of a hen's egg to the size of a small bird's egg. Seven picked up promiscuously weighed an ounce and a half. Every stone had the smoothness and polish peculiar to water-worn pebbles; they were supposed to be Lake Superior agates.

A Sneezing Fit.

Dr. Mosler, of Giesen, relates the case of a girl, who, suffering from an affection of the ear consequent upon an attack of typhoid fever, was suddenly seized with a sneezing which lasted for eighty hours. Reckoning ten sneezes per minute, he makes out that the girl must have sneezed 48,000 times.

Scalloped Tomatoes.

Take fine large tomatoes, perfectly ripe; scald them to loosen the skins, and then peel; cover the bottom of a deep dish thickly with grated bread-crumbs, adding a few bits of fresh butter; then put in a layer of tomatoes seasoned slightly with a little salt and Cayenne pepper and some powdered mace or nutmeg; cover them with another layer of bread-crumbs and butter, then another layer of seasoned tomatoes, and proceed thus till the dish is full, finishing at the top with bread-crumbs; set the dish into a moderate oven, and bake it near three hours. Tomatoes require long cooking, otherwise they will have a raw taste, that to most persons is unpleasant.

Onion Oustard.

Peel and slice some mild onions (ten or twelve, in proportion to their size), and fry them in fresh butter, draining them well when you take them up; then mince them as fine as possible; beat four eggs very light, and stir them gradually into a pint of milk, in turn with the minced onions; season the whole with plenty of grated nutmeg, and stir it very hard; then put it into a deep white dish, and bake it about a quarter of an hour. Send it to table as a side-dish, to be eaten with meat or poultry. It is a French preparation of onions, and will be found very fine.

To stew Carrots.

Half boil the carrots, then scrape them nicely, and cut them into thick slices; put them into a stewpan, with as much milk as will barely cover them, a very little salt and pepper, and a sprig or two of chopped parsley; simmer them till they are perfectly tender, but not broken; when nearly done, add a piece of fresh butter rolled in flour. Send them to table hot. Carrots require long cooking.
● Parsnips and salsify may be stewed in the above manner, substituting a little chopped celery for the parsley.

Boston Gingerbread.

Three cupsful of flour, one cupful of molasses, two eggs, one teaspoonful of saleratus, two tablespoonful of ginger, one of cinnamon, and milk enough to make it of the right consistency to roll out. Rub a piece of butter about the size of a hen's egg into the flour, and add the other ingredients; roll in thin sheets, and rub over with molasses and water before putting in the oven; bake with a moderate heat.

Lemon Tartlets.

The juice of two lemons and the rinds grated; clean the grater with bread only, using sufficient crumbs to take off all the lemon-peel; beat together with two eggs, half a pound of loaf-sugar, and quarter of a pound of butter. This is sufficient for twelve tartlets, and will be found very excellent.

Cinnamon Biscuits.

Half a pound of dry flour, one pound of lump sugar finely sifted, one pound of butter, powdered cinnamon to taste; the whole to be mixed with a glass of brandy or rum, then rolled very thin, and baked in a quick oven.

Blacking for Stoves.

Mix the lustrer with the white of an egg; have your stove cold, apply with a brush, rub till perfectly dry, and you will have a lustre nearly equal to that of a new stove.

Preparation for Yellow Pickles.

Two ounces of red pepper, a head of garlic, half a pound of bruised mustard-seed, one pound of mustard, half an ounce of turmeric, a handful of allspice, cloves and mace, one pound of green ginger scraped clean; pour on a gallon of boiling vinegar; cover close, and let it steep. Prepare whatever vegetables you choose by pouring on hot salt and water, and letting them stand three days; add a lump of alum, wash clean, and put on the preparation. The mixture should stand eight or ten days.

Pickling Hams.

To each ham put one pound of bay-salt, two ounces of saltpetre, two ounces of black pepper, and half a pound of common salt. Mix the above ingredients well together, and rub upon the ham; let it lie four days and turn it every day, then add a pound and a half of treacle; let it remain in the above pickle for a month, and rub and turn it every day. Put it into a water a day before it is cooked, and boil three hours.

Valueables.

If your flat-irons are rough, rub them with fine salt.—If you are buying a carpet for durability, choose small figures.—A hot above held over varnished furniture will take out white spots.—A small piece of glue dissolved in skim milk and water will restore old crape.—Ribbons should be washed in cold suds and not rinsed.—Scotch snuff put in holes where crickets come out will destroy them.

Burnett's Cocaine.

This article, manufactured solely by that enterprising firm, Messrs. Burnett & Co., of Boston, is the best and most celebrated article for the hair that has ever been introduced, and is recommended by physicians throughout the whole country. This concern use nothing but the purest articles in their manufactures, which have a high reputation wherever known and introduced.

Grape Vines.

Keep the soil light around your grape vines. If the earth is dry, irrigate often with soap-suds, and mulch carefully with straw or leaves. The "Isabella" and "Carawba" always succeed admirably under this treatment. The grape is a valuable fruit, and should be cultivated largely by every one.

A Gargle for Sore Throat.

Half a pint of rose-leaf tea, a wineglassful of good vinegar, honey enough to sweeten it, and a very little Cayenne pepper, all well mixed together, and simmered in a close vessel; gargle the throat with a little of it at bedtime, or oftener, if the throat is very sore.

To remove Marks of Rain from a Mantle.

Take a damp cloth, and damp the place marked with the rain; then take a hot iron and iron the mantle all over, and the marks will be removed.

Lemon Cheesecakes.

The rind of a large lemon; squeeze half of the juice, three eggs, half a pound of lump-sugar, quarter of a pound of butter, to be melted.

The old Man's Secret.

An aged clergyman, who had known not one day's illness, was asked his secret. "Dry feet and early rising," was his reply; "these are my only two precautions."

Stewed Spinach.

Pick the spinach very clean, and wash it through two or three waters; then drain it, and put it into a saucepan, with only the water that remains about it after the washing; add a very little salt and pepper, and let it stew for twenty minutes, or till it is quite tender, turning it often, and pressing it down with a broad wooden spoon or flat ladle; when done, drain it through a sieve, pressing out all the moisture, till you get it as dry as you can; then put it on a flat dish, and chop or mince it well; set it again over the fire; add to it some bits of butter dredged with flour and some beaten yolk of egg; let it simmer five minutes or more, and when it comes to a boil take it off; have ready some thin slices of buttered toast cut into triangular or three cornered pieces, without any crust; lay them in regular order round a flat dish, and heap the spinach evenly upon them, smoothing the surface with the back of a spoon, and scoring it across in diamonds.

A choice Pudding.

Make a crust as for a fruit-pudding, roll it out to fourteen or fifteen inches in length, and eight or nine in width; spread with raspberry jam, or any other preserve of a similar kind, and roll it up in the manner of a collared eel. Wrap a cloth round it two or three times, and tie it tight at each end. Two hours and a quarter will boil it.

A good cheap Cake.

A pound and a half of flour, a quarter of a pound of butter, three-quarters of a pound of raisins, a quarter of a pound of sugar, one egg, a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, and half a pint of milk—the milk to be made warm, and the soda dissolved in it. Mix all well together, and bake in a slow oven.

Puffs for Tea or Breakfast.

One pint of cold boiled milk, one pint of home-made yeast, half a pound of butter, half a pound of sugar, and five eggs; to be mixed into a stiff paste, or rather batter, which must be put into the baking-tins to rise, and, without taking out, be baked in the usual manner.

Dessert Biscuits.

Three-quarters of a pound of flour, a quarter of a pound of loaf-sugar, the peel of a lemon grated, half a teaspoonful of cream, two eggs, leaving out the whites; roll them out thin, cut them in whatever shape you think proper, and bake them in a quick oven.

French Mustard.

One ounce of mustard and two pinches of salt are mixed in a large wineglassful of boiling water, and allowed to stand twenty-four hours. Then pound in a mortar one clove of garlic, a small handful of tarragon, another of garden cress, and add to the mustard, putting vinegar according to taste.

Rice Cheesecakes, equal to Lemon.

A quarter of a pound of butter, two ounces of ground rice, boiled and beaten; mix well with sifted sugar to taste. When quite cool, add the rind and juice of a lemon, and two eggs well beaten. This will keep a month in a cool place.

Nice Pudding.

Five eggs well beaten, half a pound of flour, half a pound of butter, half a pound of raisins chopped, and half a pound of sugar. Boil three hours in a mould.

Stewed Peas.

Take young, tender green peas, and put into a stewpan with sufficient fresh butter to keep them from burning, but no water; season them with a little black pepper and a very little salt; set them over a moderate fire, and stir them about till the butter is well mixed through them; let them simmer till quite soft and slightly broken, taking off the lid occasionally, and give them a stir up from the bottom; if you find them becoming too dry, add some more butter; when done, drain off what superfluous butter may be about the peas, and send them to table hot. They will be found excellent. To the taste of many persons they will be improved by a lump or two of loaf-sugar put in with the butter, and also by a few sprigs of mint, to be removed before the peas go to table. Lima beans may be stewed in butter, as above; also, asparagus tops cut off from the white stalk.

Horse Radish.

Perhaps no vegetable so really useful is treated with so much neglect as the horse radish. Scraped into shreds or grated fine and soaked in vinegar, it becomes an excellent condiment for meat and fish; it has medicinal uses also, in cases of dropsy, scurvy, and rheumatism. It stimulates digestion, exciting the glands into action, and warms up the blood in a healthful manner. Aside from all domestic uses, it is worth raising for market.

To clean Cane Chair Bottoms.

Turn up the chair bottom, and wash well, so that it may become completely soaked. If very dirty, use soap. A slight washing of the upper part with a sponge, or flannel and water, will suffice. Let the chairs dry in the open air, if possible, or in a place where there is a thorough draught, and they will become as tight and firm as when new, provided they be not broken.

Tough Meat.

Those whose teeth are not strong enough to masticate hard beef should cut their steaks, the day before using, into slices about two inches thick, rub over them a small quantity of soda, wash off next morning, cut it into suitable thickness, and cook according to fancy. The same process will answer for any description of tough meat.

Transparent Paper.

Paper can be made as transparent as glass, and capable of being substituted for it for many purposes, by spreading over it with a feather a very thin layer of resin dissolved in spirits of wine. Fine thin post paper is best, and the mixture must be applied on both sides.

To clean Looking-Glasses.

Remove the fly-stains and other soils with a damp rag, then polish with a soft cloth and powder blue. The glass of picture-frames may be cleaned in the same manner. Be careful not to rub the gilding on the frames with your damp rag.

Milk of Roses.

Sweet almonds, two ounces; rosewater, one pint; white wax, white Windsor soap, and oil of almonds, of each one and a half drachms; spirits of wine, three ounces. Mix, and add oil of lavender, otto of roses, etc., to perfume.

Cream Pie.

Half a pound of butter, four eggs, sugar, salt and nutmeg to your taste, and two tablespoonful of arrowroot wet; pour on it a quart of boiling milk, and stir the whole together. To be baked in deep dishes.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE AGE OF MACHINERY.

We doubt if this age differs from all the other ages in any one particular so much as in being the age of machinery. In the past civilization, much as they accomplished, excelling us in many particulars, machinery did not come into general use, or it was of the simplest character. At the highest point of Egyptian civilization wheat was ground by women in a hand mill made of two stones; or, at best, by larger stones turned by oxen. The fine linen of Egypt was spun from a hand distaff, and wove in a loom of the simplest description. Thousands of men were employed in works which would now be done almost entirely by machinery. Now, machinery does a large proportion of all our work, and is every day coming into wider use. Machines make almost everything, and machines make machines. If we travel, the steam engine propels us. Our food is prepared by complex machinery. Our clothing is spun, woven, and sewed by machines. Machines knit our stockings, and do the largest part of the work in making our shoes. The pin that fastens our garments is completely made, headed, pointed, and polished, by a series of machines. The hook and eye are made from the reel of wire by a machine which seems to possess human intelligence. Unless our readers are very considerate, they scarcely know how much they are indebted to machinery. The paper you hold in your hand has come through a long series of machinery. It has passed through the cotton-gin—a very simple, but most important invention; few have done more for modern civilization. It has been squeezed in the cotton press. It has been carded, spun, woven, worn to rags; then washed, picked in pieces, bleached, ground to pulp, squeezed through rollers, and finally come out an endless sheet of white paper. The linen and hempen portions have passed through their peculiar processes. Then come type-making machines, and printing machines, and with some little brain labor, which cannot yet be done by machinery.

THAT'S THE WAY.—A storekeeper on Union Bar, Fraser River, was fined by Judge Bigbie £100, or in default of payment, to six months' imprisonment, for selling liquor to Indians.

THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

A letter from a gentleman now resident in Paris says: "There seems to be a great disposition in the French to visit England at present, and a greater number than usual of English are coming over to France. This interchange of visits and the intimacies which spring out of them, are tending to remove prejudices which are the growth of our mutual ignorance of each other. A few weeks since a wholesale dealer of Paris applied to me for an introduction or two in England, whither he was going for the first time, and on his return he called to express to me the satisfaction he had experienced. In the course of our conversation he remarked that he had found the greatest prejudice against Frenchmen among those persons who had never been in France, and that, on the contrary, he invariably experienced the greatest civility from those Englishmen who had travelled in his native country. I met another person, a few days ago, who had returned from England. He had been quite notorious among his acquaintance for his hostile feeling towards Englishmen, and for being in favor of going to war with them. On his return, on being asked whether he retained his former opinions, he replied, 'No; I have so completely changed my views about England and the English, that I hardly dare confess my present feelings to my friends.' Let us only have a few years of the operation of the new treaty, and the old feelings between the two countries will, like this individual's, be entirely changed."

COMPARATIVE.—An exchange says, the most dignified, glorious and lovely work of nature is woman, the next is man, then Berkshire pigs.

PROGRESSIVE.—The latest imported Yankeeism, says Punch, is, that a Yankee no longer marries a young critter now, he "annexes" her.

SHEET MUSIC.—Bound in neat and cheap style at this office and returned in one week.

AN HONORABLE PEDIGREE.—Printers are probably descendants of the Incas.

SLEEP.—The man who was lost in slumber, found his way out on a night mare.

A SINGULAR CASE.

France, of all the countries in the world, is that in which the most singular suicides occur, and to the long list of eccentric self-murderers which it has furnished, we must now add another of a very singular complexion. A Mrs. C— has been living for ten years in a petty little house on the road from Paris to Sevres. She kept but one old female servant, rarely went out, and was continually occupied in reading and writing. This old lady—she was about sixty-four years old—said she was engaged in literary labors, was a gay and cheerful person, and no one suspected her of entertaining suicidal ideas. Notwithstanding this a commissary of police was summoned one fine morning recently to verify the fact that she had hung herself in her bedroom. The public functionary found on a table in her room the following curious letter, endorsed "My Last Will :—"

"I am disgusted with life, and am resolved to make an end of myself, as the proverb says, 'no sooner taken than hung,' that is to say that I shall immediately execute the resolve I have just taken. I shall not falsify this proverb, which is an allusion, and which owes its origin to the tragic end of three members of parliament—Brisson, Larcher and Tardif—who, in the days of the League, were arrested at 9 o'clock, by order of the Sixteen, confessed at 10 and hung at 11, on the 16th of November, 1691. I must confess, moreover, that I have always had a great predilection for folks that have been hanged. In the first case of my library is a manuscript work composed by myself. It is a history of all the celebrated persons who have been hanged. I should also avow that the idea of hanging myself never occurred to me; only I began to be terribly weary of losing my taste for everything, even for reading, my favorite recreation. Suddenly the idea of hanging occurred to me, and I only snatch time to write this letter and then finish my existence. I desire that the rope which shall serve my purpose shall be divided among the neighbors of the two houses adjoining mine; that all my property shall be turned into cash; that from the sum it yields, a yearly pension of a thousand francs shall be paid to my old servant, and that the rest of my inheritance shall be invested in such a way as to be divided into ten equal parts, to be distributed to the first ten poor families of which a member, father, mother, son, daughter, brother, or sister, shall be hanged, from and after my decease. The functionary, mayor, commissary of police, or other higher official agent who shall verify my suicide is charged with the execution of the contents of this letter, which I declare to be my sole and valid testament."

Unfortunately for the families of the prospective victims of the rope, the old lady only possessed a life-rent, which expired completely with her.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.—In nearly all of the so-called "bitters" which are offered to the public, there is one most deleterious ingredient, viz.—spirituous liquors; indeed, it forms their usual basis. Now it is a well-known fact in medical treatment, that all such articles, though they may produce a momentary tonic effect, yet there is sure to follow a reaction as debilitating as the first effect is bracing. This is not the case with the celebrated Oxygenated Bitters, which do not contain one drop of spirituous liquors, but are compounded upon pure scientific and chemical principles. The success of these bitters in all cases of dyspepsia, acidity of the stomach, general debility of the system, and like weaknesses, has won for them an enviable reputation, until they are becoming throughout this country a household necessity. S. W. Fowle & Co., Boston, are the manufacturers, but the bitters are sold everywhere, in town or country.

PHYSICIANS IN AUSTRIA AND FRANCE.—In the Austrian empire there is one physician to each thousand of the inhabitants. In France there is only one medical man for each two thousand of the inhabitants.

PROFITABLE.—The fund of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, amounts to $650,000, and the interest annually derived is $38,325. The expenditures amount to about $33,000, including $9000 for salaries, $9000 for publications, etc.

A TRUISM.—One of the old writers says, "A fool can ask more questions than a wise man can answer; but a wise man cannot ask more questions than he will find a fool ready to answer."

AHEM !—Women are a great deal like French watches—very pretty to look at, but very difficult to regulate when they once take to going wrong.

SIGNIFICANT.—The Russian government has contracted for an enormous supply of shot and shell, for whose especial benefit, who knows?

CHURCHES.—The city of Cincinnati, Ohio, contains over one hundred churches.

It is so.—War is murder set to music!

REMARKABLE CAREER.

The Newcastle Chronicle traces the remarkable career of the Rev. Blythe Hurst, incumbent of Collierly, near Lanchester. This clergyman was born at Winlaton, in 1804, his father being a smith. At seven years of age he was taken from school and was sent to make small nails at the smith's shop. To the age of fifteen he attended a Sunday school, and in the meantime commenced to learn the business of a patten-ring maker. About the time he was fifteen, Mr. Hurst was led to think seriously about religion, and joined a dissenting body. He became a local preacher, and devoted all his leisure to mental improvement. He married early and had to provide for a family; but contrived to purchase the necessary books to gain a knowledge of the French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic languages. While at work he used to write upon his "flame stone" (the stone suspended before a smith's fire to protect the eyes of the workman) the conjugation of the verbs in whatever language he was studying, and in the evenings he wrote his exercises and translated them. In the beginning of 1840 Mr. Hurst, being then an effective local preacher among the New Connection Methodists, replied in a pamphlet to some lectures delivered by one of the disciples of Mr. Robert Owen; and this work was brought under the notice of Dr. Maltby, the then Bishop of Durham, who at once wrote that, "although it might be written by a common man, it was the production of no common mind." The bishop interested himself in the case, advised Mr. Hurst as to his course of reading, and supplied the means of following out this recommendation. A feud in the New Connexion Church at Winlaton had induced Mr. Hurst and others, to leave, and to become members of the Church of England; and, in 1841, the "learned blacksmith" was ordained to the curacy of Garrigill, near Alston. He was subsequently appointed to the living at Sealey, near Hexham; and since then to that of Collierly, near Lanchester, which he now holds. Mr. Hurst's preaching is said to be of a very high order; and, in a course of lectures which he has delivered in Newcastle, he displayed great information upon the Sinitic inscriptions and on Egyptian hieroglyphics.

AGRICULTURAL.—Hon. George S. Hillard, of this city, will deliver the annual address before the Barnstable Co. Agricultural Society in October.

CLERICAL.—The number of American clergymen is not far from thirty thousand.

THE SCHAMYL FAMILY.

A letter from Moscow, gives the following details respecting the family of Schamyl: "The Iman Schamyl has two wives, Zeidote and Chouanate. The first is about thirty years old; she is not handsome, but is very well educated, and exercises great influence over her husband, who consulted her on his most important affairs previous to his surrender to the Russians. The following fact affords proof of her influence over Schamyl: The Iman wished to marry his daughters, Naphisate and Fatimate, by a former wife, to two of the most influential Naibs in Circassia. Schamyl, at his wife's desire, changed his decision and married his daughters to two of his wife's brothers. This circumstance produced a very bad effect on the mountaineers. The Naibs resolved to revenge themselves, and they did so on the first opportunity, when he was finally attacked by the Russians. Schamyl's second wife is handsome; she idolizes her husband, and concentrates her entire affection between him and her daughter Sophiate. Chuate looks on Zeidote as a dangerous rival, and uses all her efforts to compete with her in dress. The wife of Kazi-Magoma, Schamyl's eldest son, is extremely beautiful. The wife of Schamyl's second son, who holds a commission in a Russian lancer regiment, is likewise extremely handsome. Schamyl's daughter Fatimate, who is married to the brother of Zeidote, is but fifteen years of age, and her husband seventeen. Schamyl has likewise three younger daughters, Majeonate, Bachon-Mossedon, and Sophiste. The first is extremely beautiful, but club-footed, which causes her father great pain, as he is devotedly attached to his family. The ladies of Kalonga, where the celebrated prisoner resides, visit his wives and daughters. When Schamyl is present at these visits the Circassian ladies cover their faces with their veils. A Russian lady asked Schamyl to permit the likenesses of his family to be taken, to which he consented on condition that their portraits should be taken by a lady. This condition was complied with, and the likenesses were executed."

THE JAPANESE CAPITAL.—The city of Yedo, the capital of Japan, is said to be, without exception, the largest city in the world. It contains 1,501,000 dwellings, and the unparalleled number of 5,000,000 inhabitants.

AT A DISCOUNT.—A thousand dollar carriage, made thirty years ago at Middletown, Ct., for General Jackson to ride in, has recently been sold for sixteen dollars and fifty cents.

WHAT JOHN CHINAMAN EATS.

If ever the "Central Flower Land" is thrown open to the world, and travellers pour in to study its scenery and manners, the first thing to be done will be to establish English and American hotels there—for it is very evident that John Chinaman "can't keep a hotel," at least cannot cater for European or Yankee palates. Just think of what the "critter" lives upon. The Chinaman long since found out that he could not afford to waste anything, and so conquered his repugnances and acquired a taste for many products of Nature that we rigidly exclude from our tables. The popular classes first attacked provisions disdained by the rich; from them, the children of necessity, these articles crept into use among the upper classes, and finally were generally adopted.

In Europe, the flesh of the dog is considered as the worst of all meats; in fact, is proscribed as utterly inadmissible. Now the Chinese have decided otherwise; they fatten dogs that are growing old and eat them, and the butchers' stalls are as regularly provided with dog's meat as with any other kind. The farmers, in fact, breed a species of dog adapted to fattening, which they call "butcher's dogs;" it is a kind of wolf-dog, with erect ears, and distinguished from others by having the tongue, palate and whole interior of the throat black.

It has been asserted that in certain of our eating-houses cats sometimes do duty on the bill of fare as rabbits; but the Chinese make no mystery of what they cook and eat. They regard cat's meat as excellent, and at the provision stores you see enormous cats hanging up with their heads and tails on. On all the farms you meet with these animals chained up for the purpose of fattening with refuse rice which would otherwise be lost; they are huge creatures, and the inactivity in which they are kept enables them to take on flesh readily.

The rat, too, occupies an important place in the Chinese housekeeper's list of delicacies. They eat it fresh or salt, salted rats being specially destined for consumption on board of the junks. The farmers have establishments where they raise rats as we do pigeons, for the market. In favorite corners of their ratteries—we must coin a word—they place bottles with wide necks mortared into the masonry. There rats make their nests, and from time to time the enterprising proprietor visits them and takes away the young, just as we collect squabs in a dove-cote.

We think we have said enough, however, to justify our premises, and to show that John Chinaman can't keep a hotel to our taste. The distance between a Chinese restaurant and the table d'hôte of the Revere or Tremont House, is more than the circumference of the globe, it is immeasurable. Yet the poor fellows are not to be blamed for their tastes—their teeming millions make it a necessity to live on what we should reject with abhorrence. And supposing the Chinese immigrants to adhere to their tastes in this country, it is quite easy to see that nothing is to prevent their becoming rich here; their living must cost an inconsiderable figure.

THE BELLS AND THE WIDOW.

Jean Raulin, a monk of Cluny, in the 15th century, relates the following story to show that church bells say whatever you wish. A widow asked her curate if he thought it would be well for her to marry again. She said she was without means of support, and had an excellent servant who was well skilled in her late husband's profession.

"Marry him," said the priest.

"But what if he should become my master?"

"Don't marry him," said the curate.

"But how can I support the weight of business left on my hands by the poor dear departed?"

"Marry him, then."

"But suppose my servant is only thinking of getting possession of my goods to waste them?"

"Then don't marry him."

As the woman persisted, he advised her to listen to the bells, and do what they counselled. She obeyed, and heard the tongues of bronze ring out, "Marry your servant! marry your servant!"

She married him, accordingly, was plundered and beaten, and went to the curate with the story of her woes, and a complaint against the bells. The priest told her she had not heard what they said, and ordering them to be rung again for her, she heard them say very distinctly, "Don't marry him! don't marry him!"

How many of us distort the advice we receive into a sanction of our wishes, no matter how plainly and decidedly it condemns us.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.—Why is a man who carries a watch invariably behind in his appointments? Because he's always behind his time.

PRESCRIPTION.—Sawdust pills are said to be an excellent remedy for the dyspepsia, if taken in a woodhouse.

JESTING.—A witty man can make a jest; a wise man can take one.

GRATITUDE.—Warm in those who expect a bounty.

ANECDOTE OF POWERS.

Several years ago, and before Powers became known as a sculptor, an actor called Drake—Alick Drake—had his headquarters at Cincinnati. He was a great favorite with the citizens, but particularly in the song of "Love and Sausages," which they compelled him to sing nightly, three or four times. Powers, who was at the time employed in some mechanical capacity about the theatre, took it into his head to make a waxen counterfeit of Drake, in his character of "Love and Sausages," which he did; and to test its correctness, he adopted a ruse with the audience. The curtain went up—Drake came out and sang his song as usual, retired, and was, as usual, encored. The shouting continued until the curtain was re-hoisted, when there stood Drake in the middle of the stage, hat in hand, in the act of bowing, as he had always done. But the audience were surprised to find that he still continued in the same position, and made no attempt to sing. Shouting and vociferations commenced, but no sign of life from Drake, and in the midst of applause, groans and hisses, the curtain descended. "What can be the matter with Drake?" inquired the audience. "He's struck dumb," says one. "He's paralyzed," cried another. The shouts of "encore!" commenced, and once more the curtain arose—the actor was found bowing, as before, but this time he sung "Love and Sausages" better than he had ever done in his life. His previous conduct was still unexplained, and loud shouts and applause called for an encore. After the noise had continued for some time, the curtain slowly arose, disclosing to an astonished audience two Drakes upon the stage! Both stood in the same position, both wore the same dress, both had the same figure, the same features and the same identical look, with which Drake was in the habit of commencing his "Love and Sausages." After the audience had sufficiently signified their surprise, Drake at length moved, and explained the circumstances. Had the ruse been repeated, bets could have been had to any amount that no one in the front of the theatre could distinguish the real Drake from his counterfeit presentment.

PARIS AND NEW YORK.—The population of the capital of France does not much if any exceed that of New York city.

"MUSIC OF THE SPHERES."—This celebrated music, we believe, has never been arranged for the piano.

IRON ORE.—Is found very abundant in Liberia.

SELF-PORTRAITURE.

Very few plain ladies are aware of their plainness, and of these few, it is rare that one admits it. Perhaps no lady was ever better reconciled to positive ugliness in her own person than the Duchess of Orleans, the mother of the Regent d'Orleans, who governed France during the minority of Louis XV. Thus she speaks of her own appearance and manners: "From my earliest years I was aware how ordinary my appearance was, and did not like that people should look at me attentively. I never paid any attention to dress, because diamonds and dress were sure to attract attention. On great days my husband used to make me rouge, which I did greatly against my will, as I hate everything that incommodes me. One day I made the Countess Soissons laugh heartily. She asked me why I never turned my head whenever I passed before the mirror—everybody else did. I answered, because I had too much self-love to bear the sight of my own ugliness! I must have been very ugly in my youth. I had no sort of features; with little twinkling eyes, a short snub nose, and long thick lips, the whole of my physiognomy was far from attractive. My face was large, with fat cheeks, and my figure was short and stumpy; in short, I was a very homely sort of person. Except for the goodness of my disposition, no one would have endured me. It was impossible to discover anything like intelligence in my eyes, except with a microscope. Perhaps there was not on the face of the earth such another pair of ugly hands as mine. The king often told me so, and set me laughing about it; for as I was quite sure of being very ugly, I made up my mind to be always the first to laugh at it. This succeeded very well, though I must confess it furnished me with a good stock of materials for laughter."

"MERRY," INDEED.—In Great Britain, statistics show us that there are only 103,839 persons whose income is over $750 a year, while the number of paupers is officially set down at over fifteen hundred thousand. "Merry England!"

MILITARY.—Napoleon, during his military career fought sixty battles. Cæsar fought only fifty.

LOVE.—Women often fancy themselves to be in love when they are not. The love of men is far more keen-eyed.

NOW-A-DAYS.—The commonest mode of dying for love, is turning red hair into black.

SUGAR.

Until a comparatively modern epoch, sugar was neither considered a luxury nor a necessary of life. It is a question whether it was known to the ancients; but Salmarius in his exertations upon Pliny, and Matthiolus on Dioscorides, lead us to believe that it was so, and, indeed, the former assures us that the Arabs have used the art of making sugar, as we now have it, for nearly a thousand years. In the Bible, allusions are made to "the sweet cane which came from a far country;" but the cane was not cultivated, and the saccharine matter was allowed to ooze out of the cane itself, and to harden like gum. It was known as "Indian salt," and only used as medicine, for which purpose, about 800 years ago, it began to take the place of honey. Our word sugar is derived from the Arabic soukar, but its Latin name is saccharum, now applied to all sweet tasting fluids. The sugar cane grows in any hot climate, and is supposed to have been brought into Europe first from the interior of Asia to Cyprus, thence to Sicily, Madeira and the Canaries. The Portuguese and Spanish navigators introduced it into the West Indies and tropical America, whence we now obtain our supplies of sugar. There are other varieties of sugar produced by different plants. Thus, in North America a large proportion is extracted from the maple tree, and in France from the beet root. Sugar in plants is analogous to fat in animals; as if it were the end a plant had in view by its vitality to produce and lay up in store within itself—sugar; hence, the subservience of plants to man in this case is self-evident. Nearly every flower-cup contains a minute portion of sugar, which, being gathered by bees, we are familiar with as honey, the peculiar flavor of which depends upon the blossoms it is taken from. Grapes are so full of sugar that, when dried, white crystals of it are found within the fruit, and which may be seen when raisins are cut open.

A LIFT.—Garibaldi found $5,000,000 in the royal treasury at Palermo. This will be a great help to the Italian sons of liberty.

A CURIOUS CAT STORY.

The Paris Pays tells the following cat story, which may be a "canard," and may be a verity; there is no knowing when these French editors speak the truth: "In the Budget of the Imperial printing-office, which is now before the legislative body, is an item which has excited considerable curiosity, it is for cats. It appears that, in order to preserve the stores of paper, printed and unprinted from the ravages of mice and rats, a considerable number of cats have to be kept in the establishment; and the expense of giving them food twice a day, and of paying a man to watch over them, is sufficiently great to form a special item. These cats were once nearly the cause of war between the director of the Imperial printing-office and the director of the archives, whose gardens are adjacent. The latter has in his gardens a small, artificial river, and he kept in it a number of rare, aquatic birds. He perceived that the number of his birds decreased almost daily, but he could not tell how; at last he discovered that they were killed by cats, and he set snares by which a number of these animals were caught. The keeper of the cats in the printing-office perceived his feline stock diminishing, and he suspected the workmen of the establishment of killing them. But one day a cat arrived with a fragment of a snare round its neck and led to the discovery of the whole truth. The director of the printing-office thereupon complained that his cats were killed, while the director of the archives said that he would not allow his birds to be devoured; but at last an arrangement was made to the effect, on the one hand, that every issue of the printing-office should be closed to prevent the invasion of cats into the gardens of the archives, and on the other, that in the event of one by chance escaping it should not be put to death.

Foreign Miscellany.

Eighty thousand children are born yearly in London—two hundred and twenty a day.

The annual appropriation of $50,000 for the purchase of books for the British Museum is continued, and its new reading-room is crowded with students.

The English census tables show the average number of children born in England to be about 2000 a day, and the average number of deaths about 1300 a day.

Colonel Gowen, the American employed at Sebastopol in raising the sunken Russian ships, has caused several hundred cypress and other trees to be placed within and around the English cemeteries in the Crimea.

Mr. Fairbairn's gigantic plan of a Free Art Gallery and Museum for Manchester, is in a fair way to be realized. Fifteen gentlemen have subscribed £1000 each, twenty others £500 each, and fifty more £25 to £250 each.

The London Exhibition of 1862 is a fixed fact. The guaranty fund of $250,000 has been raised. Arrangements for the building will be commenced at once, but it is not expected the "first stone" will be laid before July, 1861.

The Grand Jury of Oswego, New York, have published a card, notifying managers of fairs and festivals held by church societies that the practice of disposing of their goods by lottery is contrary to the statute, and must not be persisted in.

During the last year, says the Lancet, the women of Great Britain have borne above 2000 children a day, 769,190 in the year; but death struck down above 1300 a day, 503,003 in the year—and reduced the natural increase of population to little more than 700 a day.

The London Punch sneeringly says that Heenan exhibits qualifications for a member of our American Congress. And why not? Gully, an English prize-fighter, became a member of the Imperial Parliament after he had been whipped almost to death by his opponent.

During the past year Mr. J. B. Gough delivered 175 of his addresses in the provinces of England, 14 in Exeter Hall, and 10 in theatres, halls and chapels of London. In the provinces, it is estimated that over 140,000 listened to his arguments and appeals, and over 4000 signed the pledge of total abstinence.

The Imperial Library at Paris is in process of re-arrangement and cataloguing. Seven large volumes of titles of printed books, relating to the history of France, have already appeared. Of the 2,500,000 engravings, 800,000 have been catalogued. Two reading-rooms are now opened in connection with it—one for chance visitors and general readers, and another for students.

It is said that Alexandria (Egypt), is fast losing its Eastern aspect. European residents have rebuilt many of its streets, and now occupy the handsomest part of the city. The Protestant, Catholic, Greek and Jew has each his well-kept house of worship, while the mosques and minarets of the Mahomedan are neglected and crumbling down.

STATE PRISON, CHARLESTOWN, MASS.

WE present herewith a series of sketches illustrative of the State Prison at Charlestown, Mass., representing, in order, a convict in his prison dress, a view of one of the cells, the kitchen department, the prisoners in marching order, and an exterior view of the prison from Prison Point Bridge, all accurate delineations by an accomplished artist. The subject of prison discipline has engaged the attention of the noblest and best minds in England and this country, and the treatment of those who have offended against the laws is now more humane, more philosophical and more effectual than at any previous period of the world's history. An eminent writer says: "The true and only real object of punishment is the prevention of crime. There is, of course, a great latitude of choice in the means which may be adopted for the attainment of this object—a latitude to be limited by a just regard to the rights inseparable from human nature, however depraved, by a correct view of the true power of society over its members, and by a wise estimate of the probable effect of the means employed. In most ages of the world men seem to have imagined their rightful power over their fellow-men absolutely unlimited, and have inflicted punishment on the violators of the law apparently without regard to any other consideration than their own pleasure, and the degree of guilt they have attributed to the offender. Acting with this apprehension of their own unrestricted power, they have, at the same time, exhibited the most narrow acquaintance with the almost infinite variety of means of punishment. They have confined themselves very much to the effects of physical suffering, as if that were the sole remedy which could advantageously be applied to moral depravity; a depravity often increased, if not caused, by the temptations to which physical suffering has itself exposed men. It has happened, too, as in many other human pursuits, that the end has been forgotten in attention to the means; and the object has appeared to be rather secretly to harass and oppress the subjects of punishment, than either to deter others from the commission of crime, or to amend the habits of the guilty themselves. None would be prevented from the commission of crime by penalties which were unknown; and in the extreme depression of every physical and mental quality, it were absurd to expect any reformation of the unfortunate subjects of human severity. In all ages and nations of which we have any record, from the most civilized people of ancient times to the most civilized of a more modern era, have such extremes of severity been used in the punishment of criminals as justly to deserve the appellation of cruelty. Torture, in every horrible variety; chains; stripes; solitary confinement in darkness, dampness and idleness; promiscuous crowding of offenders, of every degree of guilt, in the same loathsome, pestilential, narrow vaults; insufficient and unwholesome food; filth, illness of the body and sickness of the soul,—are some of the evils which have, in every age, been wantonly, carelessly and ignorantly inflicted upon the violators of law; and, what is worse, they have been inflicted on those who have violated no law; upon many who have been proved innocent, after suffering the infliction of some or all the ills enumerated in this atrocious catalogue, and upon many whose imprudence alone has exposed them to the vengeance of an equally imprudent creditor. Society has, unquestionably, a right to punish the offenders against its laws and against those of God; but has it, under any circumstances, a right to inflict such suffering as we have named? Has it a right to trifle with or endanger the health, the intellect, or the remaining principles of any, even the worst, of its members? It requires no metaphysical examination of the reasons on which the first and necessary power of society is founded to answer in the negative. All feel that the proper adaptation of the means to the just end of punishment ought to be constantly kept in view. A striking illustration of the truth of this remark may be found in the universal outcry of horror and indignation which was heard throughout the civilized world when Howard disclosed the misery everywhere suffered by the prisoner; in the guilty consciousness with which those who exercised control over prisons universally shrank from the disclosure of the atrocities committed under their authority, or at best, allowed by their negligence; and to the immediate formation of associations to promote the necessary reform in the construction and government of prisoners. From the year 1777, when Howard's work on the prisons in England and Wales was first published, may be dated the origin of the study of the best system of prison discipline."

The State Prison, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, is considered as a model institution of its kind. The original structure was erected in 1804 and 1805, and consisted of a central building and two wings. The central building combined the warden's office, officers' quarters, guard-room and kitchen. The wings contained the cells, now remodelled into modern size and properly ventilated, as well as hospital apartments. The centre building is now discontinued as the warden's office and guard-room, these being located in portions of the structure since erected. In 1826, under the administration of Governor Lincoln, the present North Wing, so called, was built on the Auburn system, but though at that early day it was considered a model of humanity and propriety, yet at the present day, with the increased knowledge of prisoners and prison discipline, it is looked upon as barbarous, from the coffin-like size of its cells, its narrow areas and its gloomy port-hole windows, in the exterior walls. In 1850 the legislature passed an act for an enlargement of the State Prison, and appropriated one hundred thousand dollars for the purpose. The plans of this enlargement were the joint production of the late Rev. Louis Dwight (a name familiar to all acquainted with the history of prison discipline during the last third of a century) and Gridley J. F. Bryant, architect, of this city, who, for the last fifteen years, has made the erection of State Prisons, Jails, Houses of Correction, and other reformatory institutions his peculiar study. A description of this most extensive and important improvement to our State Penitentiary, is given in House document 140 of the legislature of 1850. Our limited space will not permit us to make more than a brief extract of what was accomplished by the erection of these additions. The enlargement consisted mainly of a central octagonal building, so placed as to be joined to and connected with the East Wing of 1804 and the North Wing of 1826, and by the erection of a new wing on the south side of this octagon building, as a part of the enlargement, the whole structure assumed the form of a centre, and three wings radiating from three of the sides, leaving a fourth side for the reception of a fourth wing, at such time as the legislature in its wisdom might deem it necessary to erect a new house for the warden and officers' quarters, which was done in 1854, thus completing the fourth arm of the "cross," which form the prison buildings have assumed since the erection of the house and officers' quarters. It is due to Mr. Dwight's memory to state that the improvement now proposed to the wing of 1826, by introducing the large windows, was recommended and urged to Governor Lincoln at the time of the erection of this part of the institution, and was further urged and made part of the plan of Messrs. Dwight and Bryant, adopted and erected in 1850, but for want of funds was deferred. In the annual report of the Board of Inspectors of the prison, dated October 1, 1858, and accompanying the reports of the officers of the institution, we find much valuable information respecting its condition for that year. The inspectors, Messrs. P. J. Stone and John A. Goodwin, say: "The prisoners, as an almost universal thing, have been prompt, orderly and respectful, appearing to be governed by a high degree of good feeling towards their officers. Many of them have shown an unusual and most encouraging desire to form fixed habits of industry and behaviour, so that on regaining their liberty, they may be prepared to lead virtuous lives. We doubt if in these respects so good a state of things ever before existed in the prison. We attribute the improvement mainly to the mild, even, discriminating, yet impartial and decided discipline maintained; to the fact that for nearly two years no corporal punishment has been inflicted in the prison, and in no small degree to the law of 1857, which virtually secures a small monthly commutation of sentence for continued good conduct. This wise provision has been observed by us to have a very salutary influence over some convicts from whom trouble would ordinarily have been expected, the keeping in their almanacs (which are given to all) a record of the days thus gained, and expressing a determination so to conduct as to secure the full benefit of the statute in question. The last few months of a prisoner's term, like the closing week of a long voyage, hang much the most heavily; when, therefore, a convict can thus shorten a one year's term twelve days, a three years' term seventy-two days, a five years' term one hundred and twenty days, or a ten years' term six hundred days, he has a very strong incentive to good behaviour. A few months' perseverance in the decorum thus induced, does much towards forming in the convict permanent habits of obedience and self-control, and developing in him a more hopeful and therefore more kindly and teachable disposition. We therefore consider this law as a very valuable addition to the legislation concerning the prison. During the year, as will be shown by the warden's statistical tables, there has been a remarkable uniformity in the number of prisoners. There are now five hundred and fifty-four cells and but four hundred and eighty-three prisoners, a surplus that we trust may never be reduced. The health of the convicts has been excellent; indeed, no better testimony can be desired, than that afforded by the hospital records in favor of the faithfulness of the officers in attending to the matters of diet, cleanliness, clothing, warming, ventilation, etc. Down to the last fortnight of the year, no death had occurred among the six hundred and thirty-eight different prisoners that have been under their charge. Of the two deaths during that fortnight, one was the result of an injury produced by the carelessness of the victim, and the other was that of a convict free from all apparent disease, who was cut off without a moment's warning by a derangement of the heart. The inmates of the hospital for the year have averaged four, and for the last six months only three and a half. Very few villages of the same population can show so satisfactory sanitary statistics." Of the labor of the convicts the inspectors say:—"For the last three years the entire labor of the convicts, excepting those employed in the cooking, clothing, laundry and repair departments, etc., has been let out to contractors, a system pursued in part for several years previously. We are satisfied that this is incomparably the best plan for the State, and that it is no less advantageous to the contractors. That the bids for the labor are all low at the best, is no fault of the system. We doubt if any other legitimate method of employing the convicts could have been devised by which they would have earned to the State anything like the sum which during the past year has been received by the prompt payments of the contractors. It is often asked why our institution cannot become self-supporting, like the prisons of some of our neighboring States. In several, if not all, the cases thus cited to our apparent disadvantage, we are informed that an important part of the prison expenses is paid direct from the State treasury, instead of, as with us, coming from the prison revenues. Thus, the prison of one of these States last year paid to the State treasury about $3000 as the excess of its earnings over its expenses; but a fact that does not appear in the annual report of that prison and that was unknown to the highly esteemed official gentleman who called our attention to the result, is that the salaries of the warden and his deputy, of the clerk and chaplain, and some similar items, are paid direct from the State treasury, thus absorbing the surplus earnings and considerable more. It would give us great gratification to be able to render our prison a source of revenue to the State; no pains have been spared, nor will be, to bring it as near this point as possible. We do not, however, think it reasonable to expect that at present a moderate amount will not be required from the State treasury to meet the excess of ordinary expenditures above the ordinary receipts. The appropriation of $15,000 made by the present legislature for the current year, will doubtless prove sufficient for the purpose." The financial condition of the institution at the close of 1858 is certainly satisfactory as briefly stated, viz: Liabilities, nothing; assets, $6,062.69. The inspectors urge an appropriation for the accomplishment of two alterations in the prison. "The most extensive portion of the main building, known as the North Wing or 'New Prison,' was completed about thirty years ago. The outer windows are little more than slits or loopholes through the massive walls, admitting little air and less light. The cells, in themselves narrow and with very clumsy entrances, have doors mostly solid, which give the inmates but a small share of the scanty allowance of light and air admitted with the outer windows. The outer wings are provided throughout with doors of open grating, set deep back in the wide doorways, and with broad arched windows extending uninterrupted from the basement of the wings to the eaves. Thus is admitted a perfect flood of the light and air essential to cheerfulness and health. The modern doors, too, from their open construction and sunken position, are much safer, offering vastly greater facilities to the watchmen who, during the night, in felt slippers, make their silent tours of inspection along the numerous corridors and galleries in turn. Our predecessors in 1853, in their annual report, recommended that the north wing be altered to conform to the others. We hardly concur in the opinion by them expressed, and beg leave to call attention to the suggestions and estimate of the warden in connection with the matter, as made in his report. The subject of a classification of the inmates of this prison, has attracted much attention in former years, but no substantial progress has been made towards its accomplishment. The inspectors in 1852, and again in 1853, strongly urged the adoption of a system of rigid classification, giving many forcible reasons therefor. We have carefully considered the subject, yet we have no plan to propose, nor are our minds fully made up as to the extent to which a system should be carried to secure the greatest good to the convicts, and the highest degree of efficiency to the prison in its combined character of a penal and a reformatory institution. Our reasonably well enforced system of silent labor and separate cells for eating as well as sleeping, destroys the force of some of the strongest arguments in favor of any close degree of classification, while our system of large contracts would be in direct collision with any such gradation. Applied to a prison with three or four times our number of convicts, a somewhat thorough classification according to character, could doubtless be made to the advantage of all concerned.

"During the last few months the prison yard and the arrangement of the shops have been much improved. The unsightly structure known as the "old chapel," has been taken down and the range of shops with which it interfered, lengthened twenty feet. A new laundry, invalid room and repair shop have been fitted up, and many other changes made for the promotion of economy, order or neatness, and health. The various improvements made have cost but little, as the materials were nearly all on hand, and most of the labor was done by convicts not wanted at the time in any of the shops. In this matter were displayed the taste, skill and prudence of Hon. Gideon Haynes, who on April 1st succeeded J. L. Porter, Esq., the faithful and estimable warden of the establishment. Mr. Haynes at an early day won our confidence and respect, and a longer experience has fully justified the high expectations then formed. Just before the accession of Mr. Haynes to office, the vacant post of deputy-warden was filled by the appointment of Mr. Benjamin L. Mayhew, for some time connected with the house of correction in Middlesex county. Mr. Mayhew is a worthy assistant of his superior, and by his energy and straight-forwardness and due regard for those under his charge, warrants us in expressing our entire satisfaction with his department. William Pierce, Esq., continues to perform, with highly commendable fidelity and earnestness, the numerous and widely diverging duties attached to the office of clerk; his long experience and consequent familiarity with the affairs of the prison under five different wardens, giving his services an especial value. In April, Dr. W. B. Morris ended his term of service as physician, and was succeeded by Dr. A. B. Bancroft; and Rev H. E. Hempstead having resigned as chaplain, Rev. Joseph Ricker of Woburn, was appointed in his stead."

We have reason to believe that the commendation bestowed on the officers of the prison is justly their due. Hon. Gideon Hayes has proved himself a thoroughly efficient warden, firm, humane and energetic. We approve highly of his views of the discipline and treatment of prisoners as expressed in his efficient report to the governor, from which we make the following extract: "Not a stripe has been inflicted during the entire year; the cat has been laid aside, I trust, forever; solitary confinement has been substituted, and with the very best result. I am aware that not only many of my predecessors, but others whose philanthropy and kindearredness cannot be questioned, have doubted the expediency or success of this experiment; but nearly two years' experience has satisfied the most skeptical upon this point. The argument heretofore used in favor of the lash has been, that by this mode of punishment the State was not deprived of the labor of the convict, as would be the case were they shut up. That they should be required to work is very true, and that the institution should pay its expenses is certainly desirable, but not the first or more important consideration. Dollars and cents should not weigh against discipline and reformation; excessive severity always tends to harden the heart. The stoutest man that ever breathed will succumb beneath the lash; he may be conquered but not subdued, and he returns to his work neither a wiser nor a better man, but too often with feelings of hatred and revenge rankling in his bosom. Upon the other hand, there is not, probably, any degree of personal severity which produces so powerful an impression upon the human mind, as solitary confinement. Thus condemned to his own thoughts, he has an opportunity of reviewing his past misconduct. In fact he must reflect, and he knows that the length of his punishment rests with himself; for the course I have universally pursued, has been to release a man the moment he expressed a willingness to return to his work, and promised to obey the rules. Nothing humiliating is ever required of him; he understands that the past will be forgotten if his future conduct deserves it. A day or two will hardly elapse ere a change is visible, and the proudest spirit will solicit enlargement, with promises of the utmost industry and quietness; and instead of the State suffering from this system, an examination of the records will show fewer days lost from this cause, considering the number of convicts, than many of the preceding years. Instances could be cited where all other methods had failed, and the subjects given up as incorrigible and hopeless; yet, under this treatment they have become changed, and are now among the most industrious and best behaved men in the prison. The old theory that prisons ought to be, not merely places of restraint, but of restraint coupled with deep and intense misery, and that so much evil is repaired by so much misery inflicted, has become obsolete." As the prison is now conducted, the unfortunate inmates are assigned no unreasonable tasks, the food is good and sufficient, their quarters well warmed and ventilated, and no punishments are inflicted calculated to harden and irrevocably degrade them. Seclusion from the world, with constant occupation, is the extent of punishment.

LOCAL SCENES.

We present, as our next series, on pages 313, 314, 315, three local sketches of great interest—the United States ship-of-the line Vermont, Washington's room in the old Hancock Mansion, Beacon Street, and an exterior view of that time-honored edifice. The Vermont was sketched at her moorings, off Charlestown Navy-Yard, where she was built, having been launched Sept. 14, 1848. She is about 3000 tons burthen, and pierced for 122 guns. She was originally detailed for service on the Japan expedition, and was then fully rigged, but the orders were countermanded, and she was stripped and laid up in ordinary. Of late years, these monster ships-of-the-line have not been favorites with naval authorities—smaller vessels are more easily handled, and the immense size and range of the modern guns make a smaller vessel equal in effectiveness to a large one, with larger batteries of smaller calibre. In time, we suppose, steam will almost supersede the use of sailing vessels in the navy. The steam navy of England and France is now enormous, and it behooves our government to build up a steam navy as rapidly as possible.

No Bostonian needs a description of the Hancock House, yet all will be glad to preserve a picture of it, and our countrymen in other States and cities will welcome all that we can publish in reference to the homestead of the man whose bold and graceful signature was the first affixed to the immortal Declaration of Independence. The mansion occupies nearly the most commanding site in Boston, and its stately, old-fashioned architecture attracts the eye amidst the crowd of buildings extending from the State House to Charles Street. It commands a view over the tree-tops of the upper Mall, across the broad Common and the forest of chimneys and of masts, of those distant heights where Washington planted his cannon when the town was in possession of the British. Formerly it had an extensive view on every side, for, at the date of its erection, the west end of Boston was a kind of rural wilderness. The house is more than a century old, having been erected in 1737, by Thomas Hancock, Esq., an uncle of the signer of the Declaration. It must have been regarded at that time as a marvel of sumptuous architecture. It was surrounded by green pastures filled with browsing cattle. The hill, which derived its name from the beacon which crowned the summit, and stood on the site of the State House, was then of much greater elevation than at present. When Governor Hancock came into possession of it, the estate was quite a little farm, for it comprised five acres. There was some pasturage for horses, and an orchard filled with choice fruit-trees, extending in the rear of the mansion. Long ago the shears of improvement, like Hotspur's river, "clipped a huge half-moon, a monstrous cantle out" of the territory. Some other changes, too, have occurred in the lapse of time, a large dining-hall and the stables have disappeared, but substantially the building is the same as when the heroes of the Revolution were welcome guests within its hospitable walls. On the outside of the house may still be seen the irons which supported large lanterns that lighted up the grounds when the governor gave one of his sumptuous evening entertainments. The knocker on the old front door is a relic of the past, when bells were unknown. This door opens on a spacious hall, 15 feet wide and extending about 40 feet to the rear of the house. This portion of the building, with the quaint, old-fashioned staircase, is the subject of our first illustration. On the right is the parlor in which Washington and Lafayette were received. The walls of this room are adorned with family portraits, including a fine head of Governor Hancock, from the pencil of Copley. Over this room is the guest-chamber, at one time occupied by Lafayette. On the other side is the chamber in which Governor Hancock died. The whole interior is in excellent preservation, and the house is so thoroughly built, that it will probably remain in its present condition for another hundred years. The architects of the past century had an eye to posterity. Here, then, lived and died one of the most prominent actors in the great revolutionary drama, the "flagitious rebel," who, with Samuel Adams, had the honor of being excluded by General Gage from the benefits of the general pardon he proffered after the battle of Lexington, president of the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts, successor of Peyton Randolph as president of the National Congress, president of the State Convention for the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and for many years governor of Massachusetts. Here was the home of the man who was present at the coronation of George III., and who lived to be an active agent in the events that deprived that monarch of the brightest jewel of his crown. No man staked more on the fortunes of the Revolution than John Hancock, for his property was located in the very focus of the "rebellion." And who can forget how, with a patriotic devotion worthy of Publicola, he bade General Washington "cannonade Boston, though it should make John Hancock a beggar?" In front of this old mansion he walked and talked with Samuel Adams, discussing the gravest question on which man can be called to deliberate, and, when he had given in his adhesion to the popular cause, within that house he gathered the bold spirits of the Revolution to "plot most precious mischief." A sad scene the windows of the old house looked down upon when British troops were encamped on Boston Common, and scarlet uniforms blazed among the white walls of their canvass city. That old pile blazed many a time, and oft gave back the roll of the British drums and the bray of the British trumpet, and it shook with the heavy cannonading on that day of days, when the flower of the British army withered before the freemen on the sacred hill of sacrifice in Charlestown. But the day of tribulation passed, the old mansion blazed forth with a festal glory it had never known before, and its portals were thrown wide open by the hospitable owner and his lady, when the American defenders of our soil, and their courtly allies of the French army and navy, had sheathed their swords and mingled in joyous celebration of their victories. What august and brilliant forms have trod the floors of the Hancock House! What beauties long ago mouldered in the grave, pattered up and down those old stairs on their high heels, filling the hall with the rustle of their silks and brocades, and the low, sweet music of their laughter! trates, legislators, soldiers and civilians, divines and wits, and men of learning, the rich and poor, have passed in and out of these portals. They are all gone now—and yet the house is haunted by their presence, and graced by a thousand charming associations.

The reminiscences of such old fabrics are fraught with a thousand sacred and social recollections. Could their walls but speak, to what thrilling scenes would they often give utterance—rivaling the boldest creation of romance!

U. S. SHIP-OF-THE-LINE, VERMONT, OFF CHARLESTOWN NAVY YARD.

A FLEMISH ROMANCE.

One night an angel appeared to Charlemagne, ordering him to rise and become a highway robber. The monarch, at first astonished, believes it to be a dream, and pays no attention to the injunction. But the angel repeats the order, and Charles is forced to recognize the finger of God. He obeys. On his road he meets a knight clad in black armor, mounted on a charger also black. It is Elegast, proscribed by the king on account of his irresistible propensity to the profession of a robber, a pastime much in favor at that time with many of the nobility. They both ride on in company, and Charles is not long before he ascertains that this man, hunted down like a wild beast, is more attached to his suzerain than are many of his courtiers. They arrive before the castle of Eggeric, one of the king's chief vassals. Elegast, who, to his calling of robber, unites the talent of subjecting all persons and things to his enchantment, casts into a deep sleep every living being within the precincts of the castle. But when he wishes to carry off the saddle belonging to Eggeric, the bells with which it is ornamented make so much noise that the vassal and his spouse are awakened. The latter declares that the noise is imaginary, and that the mind of her husband is only agitated by disturbing thoughts. Eggeric then avows to her that he is at the head of a conspiracy which is to break out on the following day, and to end in the assassination of the king. The lady, related to King Charles, tries to dissuade her husband from this wicked project. Eggeric, as a last argument, strikes her on the face with so much violence, that the blood gushes from her nose. Elegast steals towards the bed of the married couple, receives into his glove the blood of the lady, and, pronouncing some magic words, the whole castle is again plunged in sleep. He then relates to the king all that he has overheard.

Charles, thus forewarned, takes his precautions, and at the moment when Eggeric, with his friends and vassals, penetrates into the royal dwelling, he is arrested. The king having ascertained on all points the truth of Elegast's statement, punishes the traitor, whilst, on the other hand, he reinstates his faithful servitor in the possession of his rights and property. Charles then understands why on that night God had forced him to appear in the character of a robber. —History of Flemish Literature.

ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS.

The two leaves of the Eusebian Canons, executed on an entirely gold ground, and ornamented with small portraits in circular compartments, preserved in the British Museum, are the most celebrated and interesting relics of the kind possessed by England. They are painted on both sides, and the coloring is very beautiful.

The ancient copy of Virgil preserved in the Vatican at Rome is considered the finest illuminated manuscript in the world. It contains fifty paintings, five of which, however, are very badly defaced. One of these, still bright and clear, represents Achates and Æneas inspecting the works undertaken by Dido for the beautifying of Carthage, and another, King Latinus receiving the ambassadors of Æneas. Mechanics and artisans at work, the instruments they used, and the sculptures they wrought, are here preserved for the modern eye. This manuscript is supposed to date back to the fourth century.

In the Imperial Library at Vienna are preserved several beautiful Roman manuscripts of the highest antiquity. Among the number are a calendar decorated with allegorical figures of the months, and the "Dioscorides," a work of great interest in the history of painting, inasmuch as the text speaks of a drying oil, and the illustrations exhibit an artist at work with palette and easel, and slab for grinding his pigments, differing little from those now in use.—Boston Transcript.

EUROPEAN SKETCHES.

The artists and engravers still enable us, while sitting at our own firesides, to glance at the remotest lands and familiarize ourselves with the most distant scenery. Availing ourselves of this privilege, let us pay flying visits to Alexandria, in Egypt; to Beirut, in the darkened and unhappy Syria, where our Christian brethren are now suffering from the sanguinary hate of the Moslem, and at one of the most pleasing features of Trieste.

The first engraving is an excellent general view of the famous city of Alexandria (Iskanderyeh), Lower Egypt, with its minarets, fortifications, its pier, lighthouse and shipping illuminated by the rays of the rising sun. It communicates with Cairo by the Nile, and the Mahmoudieh canal. Our readers need not be told that it derives its name from its founder, Alexander the Great. The modern town is built on a peninsula, anciently the island of Pharos. The ruins of the ancient city cover a vast extent of the mainland. The present population is about 60,000, including 8000 troops and the workmen of the arsenal. Some of the wooden buildings, such as the pacha's palace, the naval and military hospitals and the schools, are really fine structures. Indeed the traveller, in some parts of Alexandria, might fancy himself in a European city. The Turkish quarter is, however, irregular and dirty. Alexandria is still the great commercial emporium of Egypt, and a large share of business is transacted here. The trade is increasing.

The view herewith published of Beyrout, Beirut, Beyrouth, or Bayruth, as it is differently spelled, is the best we have seen of that celebrated city of Turkey in Asia. It is seen stretched along the water, with its white houses and minarets, the distance being crowned by precipitous hills, which give a singularly romantic character to the landscape. In the foreground are specimens of the high caps and curious costume of a portion of the people. Beyrout, anciently Berytus, is the pachalic of Acre, Syria, twenty-five leagues from that place, and twenty-four from Damascus. Its history is lost in the night of time. Fable assigns Satum as its founder. Strabo speaks of it with praise, and it is mentioned by Pliny, Ptolemy and Dionysius. Berytus was the country of Sanconiaton, the celebrated historian of Phœnicia, who is said to have lived in the time of Semiramis, or, according to others, in the days of Gideon, judge of Israel, about 1245 B. C. Glass is said to have been invented at Berytus. The Emperor Augustus made it a Roman colony, and called it Felix Julia, after his daughter. The epithet of Felix (happy—fortunate) was attributed to it on account of the fertility of its environs, its incomparable climate, and the magnificence of its situation. Agrippa conducted two legions of the Roman army thither. Berytus, becoming the most beautiful city of Phœnicia, had a school of civil law which was celebrated throughout the East. Completely overthrown by an earthquake in 566, it soon arose again from its ruins. Still later it sustained two memorable sieges, one against Baldwin I., king of Jerusalem, in the year 1109 of the Christian era, when he took it from the Saracens, and the other against Saladin, sultan of Egypt and Syria, in 1187. Saladin finally reconquered it, after a long resistance, and was then crowned sultan of Jerusalem, Damascus and Cairo. In 1197, the Crusaders and the troops of Malek Adel met between Tyre and Sidon, on the borders of Nahr-el-Kasmieh. Victory having perched upon the Christian banners, the inhabitants of Beyrout fled at their approach. The victors of Kasmieh, according to the chronicles, found in the abandoned city provisions enough for three years, and a sufficient quantity of bows, arrows and slings to load two large ships. Since the period of the crusades it has almost always remained under the rule of the emirs of the Druses, princes of Lebanon. One of the most celebrated of them, the emir Fakhr-Eddin, made it his capital and habitual residence. He had brought home from his Italian travels, and a sojourn of nine years at the court of the Medici, in Florence, a taste of architecture and the fine arts. All the buildings ordered by him were in the Roman style. The sultan Murad IV., jealous of his power and renown, ordered Kut-chuk Ahmed Pacha to depose him. Vanquished and carried prisoner to Constantinople, Fakhr-Eddin was decapitated, and his head exposed at the seraglio gate. Still his sons succeeded to his authority. About a century since, his race having become extinct, the authority was vested in an Arab family. Beyrout is situated on a tongue of land which protrudes into the transparent waters of the Syrian sea. On the right and left are a few rocks covered with Turkish fortifications, and producing a highly picturesque effect. It has three gates and a khan (entrepot of merchandise). Open on the seaside, the other sides are surrounded by walls constructed by the emirs, and flanked by Saracenic towers. The houses, shops and bazaars are generally well built of stone, and loftier than those usually found in Syria; the roofs are terraced. The streets are paved with flag-stone, and are narrow and tortuous, and the water is so bad that the women are obliged to procure it from the surrounding country. The ancient ruins scattered about Beyrout do not allow us to doubt that the modern city occupies a portion of the ancient site of Berytus. On the west side are a cistern, and the remains of an aqueduct and ancient baths; towards the sea are the ruins of a semi-circular monument, supposed to have been the theatre of Agrippa. The population of Beyrout is composed of Maronites, Greek Catholics and Mussulman Arabs.

Trieste is the only seaport in the Illyrian provinces, the duchy of Austria, and the greater part of Hungary, and its great commercial importance, and its recent rapid development under the policy of the present emperor of Austria, make it a noteworthy place. Trieste has lately been the place of meeting of representatives from the different railways which now traverse Germany. The line from Laybach to Trieste, which is now finished, is one of the greatest importance to Austria, and to Germany in general, since a direct communication is opened between the Adriatic and the Baltic. A further line is now proposed, and will open up the rich corn countries of Croatia and Hungary, and be a source of enormous wealth. Hitherto the riches of these countries have been completely locked up, from the difficulties of conveyance, and the expense attending it, there being really no roads deserving the name in either of these parts of the Austrian dominions. In many parts, at a distance from the Danube, the crops of two or three years have been housed, without the possibility of the proprietors disposing of them, as also the exquisite wines of the country, which are almost unknown out of it, from the damage they receive by the carriage over the tracks, which cut up the country, and which tend rather to impede than promote exportation. A species of infatuation seems to have possessed the Austrian government, until the accession of the present emperor, in regard to these countries. The encouragement which the emperor now gives to everything which tends to improve the trade of Austria will, eventually, render her one of the richest countries in Europe, and the port of Trieste will far outshine the glories of ancient Venice. The situation of the town is one of the most beautiful that can be conceived, and few places can vie with it in cleanliness. The whole town is paved with flag-stones, and the greatest attention is paid to keeping the streets clean. There are several excellent hotels; of late years great improvements have been made, several magnificent buildings have sprung up. The bathing is very good, and the new baths afford every convenience for sea bathing. The new baths are in a very pretty style of architecture, and are admirably conducted and liberally patronized by residents and strangers. The "Ferdinandum" is a beautiful palace lately erected, a fine structure, and commanding a most extensive and romantic view. These elegant structures show what improvements are making in the modern part of the ancient city. Trieste is a very old place. It was of importance under the Romans, by whom it was called Tergeste, and has the remains of an amphitheatre and some arches. In the middle age it was the capital of an independent republic. It was taken by the French in 1797 and 1805. Trieste is finely situated on the gulf of Trieste, at the northeast extremity of the Adriatic Sea, and 73 miles north-northeast of Venice. The old town is built on the declivity of a steep hill, crowned by a fortress in a ruinous condition, and enclosed by old walls, and the new town Theresienstadt, Josephstadt, and the Frazen-Vorstadt, bordering the sea on a plain at its foot. It has altogether a very thriving appearance, and its streets are crowded with men of all nations. The new town is very well built, and few cities on the continent can vie with it in the solidity and comfort of its private dwellings, while its public edifices are, many of them, models of taste and elegance, that would do honor to the architecture of any city.

"HE MEANS WELL ENOUGH."

O, no doubt; but the question is, why don't he behave as well as he means? What is the use of a man's being so odd and eccentric that nobody knows what to make of him, unless he has an apologist and an interpreter like you always at hand to explain. Isn't it just as cheap, in the long run, to be good-natured and polite, as to be morose and surly? And does not a man feel better in his own secret heart when he is conscious of being the former, than he does when the shrinking and uncertain air of those who are obliged to approach him, proclaim that he is the latter? Certainly it does, for our thoughts are always busy sitting in judgment on our own selves. Any man who carries such a bearing that no timid person, or no woman, can approach him without dread, does not need to be told from without that he is no gentleman. He knows it perfectly well. He is not yet reclaimed from the savage state.—Minnie Melnotte.

THE EIGHT K'S.

The celebrated Henry Clay was denominated the Eight K's by a coterie of wags in Washington. He acquired this title thus: A gentleman sitting in the gallery of the Senate Chamber, during an interesting debate, wished to point out Mr. C. to his friend, a foreigner, who sat beside him, without disturbing the house, and wrote upon a card for him thus: "The gentleman to the left of the speaker in a klaret colored coat with krimson kollar, is Mr. Klay, member of Kongress from Kentucky.—Washington Globe.

AN INDIAN FUNERAL.

A Fort Riley correspondent of the Pittsburg Despatch gives a description of an Indian funeral, a ceremony which is only witnessed now in the Far West: There was a procession of wagons, drawn mostly by small Indian horses, called ponies. The first wagon contained a rough coffin and six old squaws, three on each side of the coffin, all kneeling, with heads bowed in mournful silence. The horses, also, walked slowly along, with their heads near the ground, as if conscious that their last sad duties were being performed for another of the native sons of the soil. The second, third and fourth wagons contained children (the youngest in front), all silent, some with downcast eyes, and others gazing at the scene in wonder. Then followed quite a number of the Indians on their ponies, all in single file, no two riding abreast. In the rear were several old Indians on foot, tottering along as if they, too, had nearly blossomed for the grave. They came to the entrance of the graveyard; the coffin was carried to the grave, a ring was formed around it, all kneeling, and as it descended, a low, moaning sound was commenced, which seemed to swell until it became sweet but mournful to the ear, then it died away in the same low sounds with which it began; all arose, and one by one left, a few of the near relatives of the deceased remaining to ponder over his untimely death.

WASHINGTON IRVING A PLAY-ACTOR.

Writing from Dresden to his friend Leslie, in 1823, Mr. Irving thus concludes one of his letters: "I have been fighting my way into the German language, and am regaining my Italian, and, for want of more profitable employment, have turned play-actor. We have been getting up private theatricals here at the house of an English lady. I have already enacted Sir Charles Rackett in 'Three Weeks after Marriage,' with great applause, and am on the point of playing Don Felix in 'The Wonder.' I had no idea of this fund of dramatic talent lurking within me; and I now console myself that if the worst come to the worst, I can turn stroller, and pick up a decent maintenance among the barns in England. I verily believe nature intended me to be a vagabond.

"P. S.—I hope you intend to make some designs for 'Bracebridge Hall.' I would rather have the work illustrated by you than by any one else."

A MAHOMEDAN PROPHECY.

It is well known that many Mahomedans are impressed with the belief that the days of their religion are numbered. Among the striking events foretold by Mahomet, as certain to precede the final consummation, is the following remarkable one: "The first of the greater signs of the end of the world is, that the sun will rise in the West. The Beirut correspondent of The World, in quoting this language, gives this philosophical and Christian interpretation of it, that the "sun" of Christianity and civilization is now arising, and is to arise from the great transatlantic "West," upon the night of oriental superstition, and give redemption to the millions who now follow the religion of the Koran.—London Globe.

PLEASANT HOMES.

The homes of America will not become what they should be, until a true idea of life shall become more widely implanted. The chief end of life is to gather gold, and that gold is counted lost which hangs a picture on the wall, which purchases flowers for the yard, which buys a toy or a book for the eager hand of a child. Is this the whole of human life? A child will go forth from a stall, glad to find free air and wider pasture. The influence of such a home on him in after life will be just none at all, or nothing good.

Thousands are rushing from homes like these every year. They crowd into cities; into villages; they swarm into all places where life is clothed with a higher significance; and the old shell of home is deserted by every bird as soon as it can fly. Ancestral homesteads and patrimonial acres have no sacredness; and when the father and mother die, the stranger's presence obliterates associations that should be among the most sacred of all things. We would have you build up for yourselves and your children a home that will never be lightly parted with—a home which will be to all whose lives have been associated with it, the most interesting and precious spot on earth. We would have that home the abode of dignity, beauty, grace, love, genial fellowship, and happy associations. Out from such a home we would see ambition taking root, and receiving all generous culture. And then we would see you and your wife happy. Do not deprive yourself of such influences as will come through an institution like this. No money can pay you for such a deprivation. No circumstances but those of utter poverty can justify you in denying these influences to your children.—Home Educator.

WOULD I WERE A CHILD AGAIN!

BY MRS. S. P. MINERVE HAYES.

O, would I were a child again,
To dwell in sunny bowers;
Where kind affection hides the thorns,
And only gives us flowers.

I'd roam all day the grassy dell,
And climb the mountain height;
And deem the stars were diadems,
That crowned the brow of night.

Then, hidden mid the tall damp grass,
I'd find the violet blue:
Its fragrance wafted on the breeze,
Betrays its charms to view.

And gazing in the limpid brook,
I'd fancy I had seen
The Naiad, that in olden time
O'er brooks and lakes reigned queen.

And when the hour for rest had come,
I'd seek my humble bed,
While guardian angels vigils keep Above my sleeping head.

O, would that childhood's innocence
Might be our manhood's pride;
And every sinful heart be saved,
For whom our Saviour died!

THE MAD CAPTAIN.

A ROMANTIC STORY OF THE SEA.

BY JOHN H. UNDERWOOD.

At the early age of twenty-one years, Augustus Rayner, the hero of our story, was appointed to the command of the fine ship Chieftain, a first-class vessel of fifteen hundred tons, which had been launched but a short time before from one of the shipyards in the vicinity of New York city, and a better seaman, more worthy commander, or more estimable man never trod a quarter-deck.

His personal appearance was decidedly prepossessing. A tall and well-proportioned figure, remarkably handsome features, and a finely-shaped head, gave him an appearance of superiority, while his many noble qualities made him a favorite wherever he was known. Although tender-hearted and susceptible of affection as a child, he was a man of undaunted courage, and the very soul of honor and integrity. Indeed, he would have died sooner than commit a mean or dishonorable action; and, as he gave all with whom he was in any way connected the credit of possessing the same high-minded and inflexible honesty of purpose as himself, he was, perhaps, too credulous, and liable to be deceived and imposed upon.

As a subordinate officer on shipboard, he had gained the respect and esteem of his inferiors to such an extent that, when it became known that he was to command the Chieftain, scores of the very best seamen then ashore presented themselves at the shipping office, and begged to be enrolled upon the ship's papers upon any terms. All could not be shipped, of course, but from having so large a number to select from, the shipping master was able to retain the best men in the merchant service, and when the Chieftain sailed, she had aboard as fine a crew as ever broke a biscuit, or knotted a rope-yarn.

Previous to assuming the command of his first ship, Captain Rayner had remained on shore for nearly a half year. Having no parents living, he had spent the greater portion of this time at the house of his only sister, who had been recently married, and who resided in the western part of the State of New York. During his visits at this place, he had formed an acquaintance with a young lady of great beauty and many winning traits of character, who, being a distant relative of his sister's husband, and residing in the same town, was on terms of intimacy with the family.

To arrive sooner at the more important incidents of our narrative, we will omit details, and simply state that ere the susceptible sailor had known the fair Lucy Granville a single month, he had fallen madly in love with her; while her manner toward him, and the nature of their intercourse, seemed a proof to disinterested observers, as well as to Rayner himself, that she not only encouraged his attentions, but fully reciprocated his love.

At length it came to be regarded as a settled matter by their mutual acquaintances, that Augustus Rayner and Lucy Granville would one day be united in the bonds of matrimony; and Mrs. Harding, Rayner's sister, frequently joked him upon the subject, sometimes warning him, half in jest and half in earnest, to beware of Lucy, as she bore the well-deserved reputation of being a coquette, and had already "jilted" half a score of sighing swains, although she was yet scarcely eighteen years old.

But neither raillery nor warning had the slightest effect upon the youthful commander, who had never before known the meaning of the word love, but who had now fixed his affections upon an earthly idol, with an intensity of devotion of which few men are capable ; and before his departure upon his first voyage in the Chieftain, he had confessed his love to Lucy, and they had become formally betrothed, with the unqualified sanction of the young lady's relatives, and the hearty approval of their mutual friends.

In a few days after this happy event, the Chieftain sailed from the port of New York, bound to the coast of Chili, thence to an English port, and from there to the West Indies and home. It was a long voyage, but the thought that Lucy's letters would await his arrival at each port, and above all, that she had promised to become his wife upon his return, cheered and sustained Captain Rayner in his long absence from home. At Valparaiso he received several letters from home, including one from Lucy, filled with protestations of eternal love, and speaking in enthusiastic terms of the happiness which awaited them in the future.

Upon his arrival in England, he found another letter awaiting him, but less enthusiastic, and, it seemed to him, less fond than the former ; but still so acceptable, that in his joy at receiving it, he soon forgot the momentary pain which its apparent coldness had occasioned him. When he reached the West Indies, however, and found there no letter from Lucy, a terrible suspicion took possession of his mind. He soon, however, rejected the idea of infidelity on the part of Lucy as being unjust and absurd, and patiently hoped from day to day to receive some message from her. At length the Chieftain was once more ready for sea, and still no letter had been received, and though this neglect occasioned Rayner no little pain, he endeavored to satisfy himself that it arose from some delay of the mails—for in those days the ocean mails were not as certain as at present—and consoled himself by anticipating the joy in prospect for him at the termination of his voyage.

In due time the Chieftain arrived at New York, and Rayner, having first despatched letters to his sister and to Lucy, to inform them of his arrival, proceeded, as soon as his ship was paid off, and he felt at liberty to leave her in charge of the mate, to the town in which Lucy resided.

He hastened to the home of his sister, and his first question, after the customary salutations had been exchanged, was in regard to Lucy. To this he received only an evasive answer, but something in his sister's countenance gave him cause to fear that she had some intelligence of a painful nature in store for him. He begged her to tell him the worst, at once, and at length she yielded to his entreaties, and informed him that Lucy had been recently married to a wealthy merchant of New York city, whither she had gone to reside.

These terrible words had scarcely been uttered, when Rayner gave a deep groan, and fell insensible upon the floor. He was immediately placed upon a couch, and a physician was hastily summoned, but for hours the wretched man remained insensible, and when, at last, he was restored to animation, a brain fever of the most violent and dangerous character had seized upon him.

For many days his life was despaired of, and through long weeks of intense suffering, he raved ceaselessly of the cruel girl who had forever destroyed his peace of mind. Nor was his reason restored with returning health. On the contrary, he rose at length from his sick bed, a wretched maniac.

He was soon removed, by the advice of his physician, to a private lunatic asylum, where he remained for several years in a state of quiet imbecility for the greater part of the time, with occasional fits of violent madness, however, during which it was necessary to confine him with the utmost care.

As the months rolled on, these fits became less and less frequent, and the attendant physicians began to entertain strong hopes of his complete recovery. Nor were they disappointed. He continued to grow more and more quiet and rational, until, after he had been for five years an inmate of the asylum, he was discharged in perfect health, and recommended to avoid henceforth all violent excitement, lest his malady should return.

He soon obtained a command in the same employ in which he had formerly sailed, and for many years continued to follow the sea with more than ordinary success. He amassed considerable property, and at length was able to purchase a fine clipper ship ; but, even then, he seemed to have no thoughts of retiring from his profession. Indeed, active occupation had become a necessity to him ; for he had never fully recovered from the terrible shock which the infidelity of the only woman he had ever loved had given him, and a deep melancholy had settled upon him, which might be speedily increased to insanity, should his mind be left free from the healthful cares of business, to feed only upon its own dark, morbid fancies.

Being himself well aware of this, he allowed himself no rest from his labors, but taking command of his new ship, and investing the remainder of his capital in her cargo, he endeavored to banish all thought and recollection of the past, in the active pursuit of gain, for which, in itself, however, he cared nothing.

Eighteen years had rolled over the head of Captain Rayner, since first he trod the quarter-deck of the Chieftain, as its proud and happy commander—proud in the attainment to an honorable and well-merited position, and happy in his new-born dream of love—and he was still ploughing the seas, and visiting every quarter of the globe, in the capacity of master and owner of the good ship Syren. Although he had not yet passed the usual age of manhood's prime and glory, the silvery threads which were already visible among his jet-black locks, and the furrows which had begun to mark his still handsome features, indicated that grief had anticipated the work of years.

He had just discharged a cargo of cotton, which he had brought from New Orleans, at Havre, and his ship was nearly ready to sail upon her homeward passage to the United States, when a middle-aged gentleman applied to him for passage in the Syren for himself and daughter. Although of late Captain Rayner had been averse to taking passengers, preferring comparative solitude to the society of strangers, he could not well refuse the request of the gentleman, who accordingly engaged passage under the name of Manning, and on the eve of sailing, came on board the Syren, accompanied by his daughter, a very lovely girl of seventeen.

Captain Rayner was not on board at the time, and, as Mr. Manning and his daughter had retired before his return to the ship, he did not meet them until the next morning at the breakfast table. Having risen early, he had gone on deck to superintend the operation of heaving the anchor under the bows, for it had been decided that the ship should sail with the morning tide; and when he returned to the cabin, the passengers and first and second mates were already seated at the table.

As he entered the cabin, Miss Manning was seated in such a position that he was unable to see her face; but when, in obedience to a signal from her father she rose for the purpose of being introduced to the captain, and turned toward him, Rayner started in amazement, and trembled violently, while his countenance became pale even to ghastliness.

"Captain Rayner, allow me to make you acquainted with my daughter Emily," said Mr. Manning; but ere the captain could reply to the young lady's courteous salutation, his fearful agitation had been observed by all at the table, and Mr. Manning continued: "Why, captain, you are very ill! Can I assist you in any way?"

"No, I thank you, sir. It is merely a momentary pain to which I am subject; I feel relieved, even now." And grasping the arm of a chair for support, the captain saluted his fair passenger with evident effort, and apologized for his apparent rudeness upon the plea of a sudden and severe spasm of pain.

But the incident had imposed a feeling of restraint upon each one of the party, and there was but little conversation around the breakfast table that morning, beyond what common courtesy demanded; but whenever Emily Manning glanced toward Captain Rayner, she met his eyes fixed upon her in a manner which rendered her most uncomfortable, and almost frightened her, for there was something fearful in his gaze which haunted her for many a long day afterward.

Shortly after breakfast, the anchor was catte<sup>d</sup>, the topsails and courses loosed and she<sup>d</sup>et home; and in a few hours more the Syren was breasting the billows of the open Atlantic under full sail, and before a strong breeze, which continued for several days. At length, however, the wind hauled suddenly ahead, and a whole week was passed in beating to windward under short sail, and with but little progress upon the proper course.

During this time, the intercourse between Captain Rayner and his passengers had been rendered most unpleasant by the singular and unwonted manner of the former, who had suddenly thrown aside the courtesy and affability, which heretofore he had ever exhibited toward those around him, and had become distant, reserved, and almost unpardonably rude in his intercourse with Mr. Manning and his daughter. Moreover, he had suddenly assumed an extremely haughty and overbearing manner toward his officers, and seemed to take a fiendish delight in tyrannizing over the crew.

Such a vast and inexplicable change in their commander whom they had ever regarded as the exact opposite in temper and disposition from what he now appeared, occasioned great surprise and speculation as to its cause among officers and men. Many were of the opinion that he had suddenly become addicted to intoxicating drink, and that he, the most estimable of men when sober, became a perfect demon under the influence of alcoholic stimulants, but the mate, who had sailed with him for many years, scouted this idea, and declared, with a mysterious wag of his head, that if he were at all superstitious, he should certainly believe that Captain Rayner had become possessed of a devil!

Meantime, matters grew rapidly worse. Frequently at meal times, Emily Manning discovered the captain glaring at her in such a wild and ferocious manner that she felt compelled to leave the table and retire to her state-room. At length this state of things became so unendurable that Mr. Manning, albeit he was not a very courageous man, ventured to demand an explanation from Captain Rayner; but his only response was a furious and almost demoniac demonstration of rage and indignation, which struck terror to the heart of the timid passenger, and caused him, henceforth, to hold his peace.

On the twelfth day of the passage a violent gale suddenly arose, and it became necessary to shorten sail with the utmost possible haste. Captain Rayner was promptly on deck, at the commencement of the gale, and for a time, delivered his orders for taking sail, in his wonted cool and deliberate manner; but as the storm waxed fiercer and fiercer, the war of the elements seemed to arouse a similar tumult in his bosom, and he poured forth his commands in the most furious manner, accompanying each with some fearful imprecation, and bidding the men perform many tasks not only unnecessary, but impossible. Never before had his officers or crew seen Rayner so violently excited, and more than one superstitious tar began to experience a feeling of awe, as he gazed upon the captain's flushed cheeks and glaring eyes, and thought, with a shudder, of the power which the evil one is said to be sometimes permitted to exercise over mortals.

At length, however, the sail was reduced to close-reefed topsails, fore staysail, and reefed spanker; and Captain Rayner, completely exhausted by the violence of his passion, and his frantic exertions, retired below, to the great relief of his harassed and over-worked crew. He was seen no more on deck, during the remainder of the day or the following night, being confined to his state-room, the steward said, with a violent headache, and symptoms of fever.

During the night, the gale rather increased than diminished, and by dawn of day, the mate, who had spent the entire night on deck, had caused the fore and mizzen topsail to be furled, and the royal yards sent down.

Shortly after breakfast, Miss Emily went on deck, accompanied by her father, to enjoy the sublime and awful scene presented by the raging, tempest-tossed sea. There are few things in nature more grand than the wild ocean, when the storm spirit is abroad in his might;

"And when the ship from his fury flies,
When the myriad voices of ocean roar,
When the wind-god frowns in the murky skies,
And demons are waiting the wreck on the shore;"

and Emily long continued to gaze upon the wide expanse of heaving, foam-capped waves, with a deep and vivid appreciation of the grandeur of the scene. Presently Captain Rayner sprang up the companion ladder, and glancing aloft, exclaimed in a voice of thunder to the mate:

"How dare you furl the topsails without my orders, sir?"

"Why, sir, it was blowing very hard at the time, nearly as hard as it is now, and as I knew the topsails must come in, I thought it was not worth while to disturb you," replied the mate.

"Blowing, was it? Well, do you suppose I care for the powers of the air? No, indeed! I fear neither men, demons, nor the elements! Send hands aloft immediately to loose and shake the reefs out of the fore and mizzen topsails, and out of the mainsail as quickly as possible."

The mate stared in the captain's face, in mute astonishment; but a repetition of the command, enforced with a volley of fearful oaths, caused him to hasten forward and give directions for loosing the topsails.

All eyes were now turned toward Captain Rayner, who stood beside the mizzen-mast, holding by the pipe-rail, and trembling violently. His countenance bore an indescribably haggard and ghastly appearance, but his eyes gleamed like coals of fire, and ever and anon sparkled with fiendish glee as he looked abroad upon the stormy sea, and upward, toward the men, upon the yards, engaged in obeying his orders.

With great difficulty the fore and mizzen topsails were sheeted home and hoisted, and the maintop sail enlarged to its full extent by shaking out the reefs, was, at length, mast-headed. The effect of this additional canvass upon the greening spars, and straining hull of the ship, was, indeed, tremendous. She heeled over to leeward until her lee channels were submerged, and it was with no little danger and difficulty that the men were able to pass from one part of the deck to another.

"Loose away the topgallant sails fore and aft, and the foremast staysail!" shouted Rayner, to the astonishment and terror of all, as soon as the topsails had been set.

A loud murmur of disapprobation was heard from the crew who had assembled abaft the mainmast; and even the mate stood for a moment in a state of indecision as to whether his duty to himself and the rest of the ship's company would allow him to obey these last commands.

"You surely are not going to put more sail upon the ship!" said Mr. Manning, in a low voice, catching the mate by the arm, when Captain Rayner's attention was for an instant diverted.

"It would be mutiny for me to disobey, although it will be a suicidal act to set the topgallant sails in this gale; and if Captain Rayner persists in his present course of action, we shall all be food for sharks before many hours," was the reply.

"Mr. Stephens!" exclaimed the captain, at this moment, "why do you not obey my orders?"

"The masts will not bear another inch of sail, sir, and—"

"Ha, do you refuse to obey, you dog? Steward, bring me a revolver!"

The pistol was instantly brought, and Captain Rayner, having presented it to the mate's head, exclaimed:

"If you do not send the men aloft to loose the topgallant sails in less than half a minute, I'll blow your brains out!"

The fierce glare of his eyes and the rigid contraction of his lips indicated that he would certainly fulfil his threat; and the mate, who, though a brave man, was not ready to throw away his existence, while a chance of saving it remained, promptly yielded to necessity, and ordered hands aloft to loose topgallant-sails.

In silence the men obeyed, but they felt, as they ascended the rigging, that the Syren was doomed to certain destruction. Mr. Manning approached his daughter, who still remained on deck and besought her to retire below; but although she was now fully aware of the impending danger, she resolutely declined, for there was a kind of fascination in the scene, and she knew that if the ship must be lost she should be no safer below than on deck. For a few minutes no sound was heard save the roar of the winds and waves; then the cry from the sailors upon the lofty yards, of "Sheet home!" was faintly heard above the shrieks of the gale, and presently the three topgallant sails were flung to the breeze, and swayed up to the mastheads.

With this increase of canvass the Syren fell almost upon beam ends, and the waves began to make a clean sweep of her main deck. The men sprang to her live-lines, and with the energy of despair succeeded in preventing themselves from being swept overboard, while those who stood upon the quarter-deck grasped at whatever means of support were at hand. The masts swayed like reeds, and the shrouds seemed ready to burst asunder with the tension, while every timber in the hull creaked and groaned with the strain it was compelled to bear.

Despair was fast chilling the life-blood in the veins of all, when a yell and a demoniac laugh from Captain Rayner startled them so fearfully as to divert their thoughts in an instant from their dangerous situation.

"Ha, ha, ha!" he shrieked, as he quitted his hold upon the mizzen rigging, and danced madly about the deck. "Ha, ha, now we go! Blow, blow, ye winds—harder! harder! There are demons waiting for us down below, and we shall soon be at anchor in the infernal regions! O, now I am happy once more—my hour for revenge—sweet revenge—has come! You who have enjoyed my misery these many long years, are bound direct to the place of eternal torment! Ha, ha, ha! But Lucy Granville, fair traitress, you fiend in the guise of a beautiful woman, shall go home with me by a still shorter route!"

And as he spoke, he sprang toward Emily Manning, and clasping her in his arms, bore her shrieking and helpless to the lee rail. Ere a hand could be extended to stay his progress, he had leaped upon the rail, and crying in a fearful tone, "Farewell, gallant comrades, we shall soon meet again in the realms of death!" was about to plunge headlong, with his insensible burden, into the boiling sea, when a huge wave burst over the quarter, and hurled him back with Emily still clasped to his bosom, upon the deck. A moment more, and a dozen pair of stout arms had grappled the maniac, and torn the fainting girl from his embrace.

In spite of his frantic and almost superhuman efforts to free himself from the grasp of his captors, the madman was immediately bound hand and foot, and borne to his state-room, foaming at the mouth, and gnashing his teeth in frenzy. He had scarcely been secured in his berth, when, with one terrific crash the three masts of the ship went by the board, and the ill-fated Syren was reduced in a moment, to a helpless hulk.

Providentially, the wreck of her spars, which dragged alongside, held her head to the wind, until a couple of spare royal yards had been raised and stayed for jurmasts, upon which sufficient canvass was placed to heave the ship to, when the wreck was promptly cleared, and all hands set at work preparing the boat for immediate departure, in case of necessity.

It was soon ascertained, however, that the ship had not sprung a leak, and when upon the following day, the gale subsided, three substantial jurmasts were rigged, and a spread of canvass made from the spare sails aboard, under which, after three long and tedious weeks, the mate succeeded in navigating the ship safely into port, by which time Captain Rayner had fully recovered from his temporary madness, and its effects upon his physical organization, and was once more possessed of his reason.

Shortly after he had been carried below, and bound in his berth, he had fallen into a deep slumber, from which he awoke, still deranged, and seriously ill of a fever, but no longer violent or dangerous.

But the strangest and most romantic part of our story yet remains to be told. During the captain's illness and convalescence, he was nursed with the most tender and unremitting care by Emily Manning, the daughter of his once-loved Lucy, who had long since passed away from earth. As soon as Captain Rayner's reason was restored, mutual explanations were made, by which the following facts were brought to light.

The captain had never ascertained the name of Lucy's husband, nor had that gentleman ever heard of Captain Rayner; but when Mr. Manning and his daughter came aboard the Syren at Havre, the wonderful resemblance of Emily to Lucy Granville at the time when he first became acquainted with her had been the cause of Rayner's fearful agitation; and by bringing a train of vivid and painful reminiscences to his mind, had induced, by slow degrees, the violent attack of madness which had so well-nigh proved fatal both to himself and the innocent cause of his insanity.

In his madness he had become possessed of the idea that Emily was in reality Lucy Granville, and had sought to take her life in revenge for her fancied treachery. It also appeared, from the statements made by Mr. Manning to Captain Rayner, that Lucy had died of a lingering disease, a few years after her marriage. The skilful physician who had attended her, had expressed the opinion that her malady arose from mental rather than from physical causes, and that some secret trouble was rapidly wearing away her life. The event proved that his opinion was correct. Mr. Manning earnestly besought his wife to confide to him her secret griefs; but she firmly refused to do so, until, upon her deathbed, she confessed that she had never loved him, that she had married him only for his wealth, and that she had never loved but one man, who, driven to madness by her marriage with another, was now an inmate of a lunatic asylum. Remorse for her infidelity to him had destroyed her peace of mind, and finally hurried her to an untimely end. The name of this person, however, she had never revealed.

Captain Rayner's connection with Mr. Manning and Emily did not end with the arrival of the Syren at her destined port. On the contrary, the peculiar nature of their relations caused a strong friendship to spring up between the parties; and Captain Rayner, having retired from his profession at the termination of the voyage, became a frequent and welcome visitor at the house of Mr. Manning.

The perfect resemblance of Emily to her deceased mother, as he had known and loved her, caused him to regard her with peculiar affection and reverence; and when, as their acquaintance grew into a strong and mutual friendship, he discovered that she was in reality the almost angelic being which he had delighted to picture his first love in his dreams, rather than what she really was—a woman possessed of the common frailties of her sex—the love which he had ever borne toward the mother—undiminished, even, when he knew that she was lost to him forever, was naturally transferred to the daughter.

But little remains to add. In less than a year after Captain Rayner had relinquished the command of the Syren, he became the happy husband of Emily Manning, who, although more than twenty years his junior, loves him with a pure and devoted affection, alike rare and beautiful.

And now in the enjoyment of all that can render life happy, he is realizing an ample compensation for the years of grief and sorrow which are fled never to return; the gloomy morning of his existence has been followed by a bright and happy noonday, a serene and peaceful evening.

BELLS IN THE FIDGI ISLANDS.

A few words respecting the Tongian, or rather Fidgian bell; for it is manufactured in the Fidgi Islands (South Pacific). The Tongians like our bells very well, on account of their strong and melodious vibration; but for range of sound, their lali is far superior. Imagine the trunk of a tree, three or four feet long, slightly bevelled at each end, and hollowed out in the form of a trough. It is placed on the ground upon some elastic body, generally upon a coil of rope; and to protect it from the rain, covered by a sort of roof. When they want to give the signal for divine service, they strike the mouth of the lali with a mallet, which produces a sort of stifled roar. I should have thought that it could only be heard to a short distance; my mistake was great. There are lalis, the distinct sound of which may be heard to a distance of twelve miles when the air is calm. And yet when you are near it, the sound is not sufficiently loud to startle you in the least; but as you recede it becomes clearer, more mild, and harmonious. When you go to a village and hear its lali, do not judge from the distinctness of the sound that strikes your ear that you are approaching the place, for you may be mistaken. The lali is, therefore, the favorite instrument at Tonga, and deservedly so. It is named in the same manner as we give names to our bells. On feast days the Tongian artists perform on the lali peals that are not wanting in harmony. They rival each other in ability and skill, and are doubtless no less proud of their performance than our bell-ringers in France.—French Missions.

TO A DISTANT FRIEND.

BY W. L. T.

I am thinking, my dear, of the morning
When you stood at a stranger's side,
And he promised to love and cherish you,
Though weal or woe betide.
So you spoke the solemn vow,
And breathed the mystic word,
And though your accents faltered low,
The listening angels heard.

Then came the sad farewell,
And your smiles with tears were dim,
As you bade sweet childhood's home adieu,
To go afar with him.
Ah, they missed your gentle presence
More than words of mine can tell;
And strangely dark grew that pleasant home,
Where the sunshine used to dwell.

The lilacs still blush in beauty,
Bursting petals deck the trees;
The syringas have opened their creamy cups
To the kiss of the honey-bees.
Sweet carnations in every border
Cast perfume upon the breeze;
And your rosebush, all laden with glory,
Blooms bright by the gray willow trees.

But they miss you when the morning
Bathes the earth with rosy light;
They miss you when the evening walks
In glittering robes of white.
And they miss you when the flowers bloom
Beside the cottage door;
For the hand that trained those blossoms bright,
Plucks the opening buds no more.

STEWED LOBSTER:

— OR, —

RAISING A GHOST.

BY A SENATOR'S WIFE.

THE thinking world is divided into two classes—those who believe in ghosts and those who do not. Of late years, some very vigorous writers, such as Mrs. Catherine Crowe, in her "Night Side of Nature," and Mr. Robert Dale Owen, in his "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," have openly avowed their belief that the spirits of our friends revisit earth; and they boldly advocate the doctrine of the influence of dreams. A greater than either, Dr. Johnson, was deeply tinctured with superstition, and no one can accuse him of not having possessed strong common sense on all ordinary subjects.

I know all that has been said of the absurdity of imagining that while no ghosts glide along great battle-fields, or emerge from the waves where naval actions have been fought, we should find in some obscure hole or corner where a single person was done to death, that solitary shade returning to complain of the shedding of its blood. Creaks of gold, the portion of a fortunate interpreter of a dream; wills abstracted to be discovered after the due adjurations of at least three nights. These, and such as these (putting wonders out of the question), constitute at least nine-tenths of the causes of ghostly visitations all over the land, and seem hardly of sufficient importance to call the spirit from its dread abode.

I do not believe there have been many murders in my family. No maiden aunt drowned herself for love; no grim uncle murdered his brother, no gentleman of the family has had to complain of any cruel Barbara Allen; or, on the other hand, no Margaret's grizzly ghost to glide to William's feet. I have lived, too, in haunted castles, traversed by ghosts in all directions, and not been molested by anything more dreadful than the larceny of rats behind mouldy wainscots; and I have looked down from dizzy battlements, from which, according to the most authentic legends of the country, ghosts or wraiths, or ladies of the lake, nightly were to be seen in all directions, and by dozens, without catching anything more visionary than the glancing of the moonbeam upon the bubbling spray of the torrent underneath. It is, therefore, not without some reason I may ask the favor of being deemed not remarkably superstitious on the subject of ghosts or of dreams; and yet—but I shall let the reader see and determine.

My childhood was passed in a remote district of New England, where at that time, the old, imported superstitions had not died out. From an old governess I imbibed principles which taught me that belief in the surrounding superstitions was not only absurd, but sinful. Her education, alas, like much other education, was like Penelope's web. I undid the toil of the morning lecture of the governess, by swallowing with thirsty care the putting-to-bed stories of the nurse. Emancipated from the trammels of education, I ran the usual gauntlet of young ladies of my rank. I danced and flirted a season or two, and then my hand was given to a cousin some degrees removed—given indeed with my consent, and something more than my consent—given with full heart, and if it were free this moment, dear Horace, and you asked for it, it should be yours with as perfect truth and happiness, as if the last ten years, blotted out of time, were to be repeated to-morrow.

His family residence was a venerable mansion, and there I spent the first two years of my marriage. We made one formal visit of a short fragment of a season to Boston, but Brownvale was our abiding home. Ambition suddenly came over my husband's mind, and during one of those Boston visits he was persuaded to allow himself to be put in nomination as Senator to Congress. There was a great deal of worry about it, but he was elected. As he was rich, the expense was no object, and the bustle and excitement of the election amused me greatly. It was now necessary that we should have an establishment at Washington. We secured a handsome residence and furnished it splendidly. Nothing was left undone or wanting, that taste or wealth dictated. It was a large house, but no part was neglected, from the massive splendor of the drawing-room to my own pretty bijou of a boudoir.

We gave very gay parties in our very gay house, and Horace was quite happy with his new toy. I went out a great deal, and attracted as much admiration as generally falls to the lot of a lady who presides over recherche dinners, and opens her house to distinguished people. Yet I felt infinitely lonesome, for all that; neither my health nor my inclination suited the eternal round of visiting, and I gradually diminished my nights of going out. I missed the hospitable dinner parties and joyous frolics of New England, and in truth I was very much alone. The senate, then in the full vigor of the session, occupied many of my husband's nights, and gave ample business to every hour in the day. Our dinners were taken at any time he could spare. Being very little of a politician, I could not force myself to feel any great interest in the general conversation, except so far as they amused or excited my husband; and I am sure that if he had taken it into his head to follow pugilism with as much zeal as he did politics, I should have lent as attentive an ear to the controversies of the ring, as I did to those of the senate chamber.

It was altogether against his wish that I narrowed my visiting circle, but I felt myself unequal to going through what was no more than a fagging duty. If I had a conquest to make, a daughter to marry, or any other such stimulus, it might have been a different case, but I had nothing of the kind. The consequence of all this was, that I spent many evenings alone in my gilded apartments. I generally occupied myself in reading, from the time Horace left me, and his return—very often broad daylight discovered me still so engaged. I cannot flatter the authors whom I read, that the intense interest of their volumes had not in the intermediate time occasionally acted as a narcotic. For this waiting up I received many a gentle chiding, which generally terminated by an assurance that the session would soon close, and that then we should all again breathe the bracing air of New England.

"We shall then forget these follies," he would exclaim. "I wish from the depths of my soul I had never embroiled myself in them." This would be said with the air of a much-enduring man, who was making the most enormous sacrifice for the good of his country. I saw that the career in which he was now engaged gratified him to the centre of his soul, nevertheless; and I encouraged him accordingly to undergo his sufferings with due resignation, for which I was sure of being rewarded with an affectionate kiss, and with the seriously-bestowed title of "my dear, good little wife."

One evening I had a small dinner-party, consisting almost exclusively of ladies, upon which he barely looked in for a moment. We chatted through the hours pleasantly enough, and our numbers gradually fell away to three elderly ladies and myself. We were all natives of New England, and my companions had spent most of their time there. Prattling chiefly on our own family traditions—we were all cousins—brought the hours very near to midnight, and such refreshments as ladies can venture to take had made their appearance, when it suddenly occurred to the oldest of the party, Aunt Patience, that something in the shape of supper would be acceptable.

"I know you have a lobster in the house," she said. "Suppose you stew it for our supper—I know just the only right way to do it."

So a cloth was laid, and a large blazer, such as we cook venison steaks on, got ready. Aunt Patience would trust nothing to the servants, and commenced her work. The meat of the lobster was placed in a silver chafing-dish, over it was poured a bottle of claret, and various condiments were added. After simmering fifteen minutes the stew was cooked, and I can tell you I never ate anything in my life half so delicious. I indulged in it freely, and soon after supper, my friends having gone home, and Horace not returned, I retired to my sleeping apartment. They were in a distant part of the house, and when I had dismissed my maid, I was almost as much alone as if I had been under another roof. The room in which I seated myself and began to read, was large and dimly lighted by my table-lamp. I felt a troublesome sensation of loneliness. The very splendor of the furniture by which I was surrounded only augmented the solitariness of my situation. Many hands, I thought, had been here busily employed—the ingenuity, the labor of many an hour set to work to produce what I dimly see all around; but the workman has departed, and his voice is hushed. I became excessively nervous. I was half afraid to look at the pictures, and the patterns of the paper on the walls assumed in my eyes figures and appearances anything but agreeable. I got up and walked about the room and opened a window. This, except that it let in a draught of cold air, did me no service, for the back of our house commanded only views of stables and their yards. I closed the sash and returned to my book; but the same class of ideas recurred.

The volume I was reading contained one of Edgar A. Poe's strange stories—"The Wonders in the Rue Morgue." I recollected how defenceless I was if any one should break into the house through the stable-yard, into which I now regretted having looked. All this was very weak, I admit; but my situation, then of a delicate nature, made me fidgetty. I determined to call to my maid, who slept not far off on the same floor, and with her to pass the hours which might elapse before the return of Horace.

I rose to do so, but my purpose was at once arrested as I looked at the door. Was it magnetism? I saw the handle of the lock distinctly turn. There was no one nearer it than myself. I rubbed my eyes and looked round with the most piercing scrutiny of gaze. It moved again. There was the most perfect silence all around. I sunk back in my chair, but my eyes could not withdraw themselves from the handle of the lock. It moved once more, and I all but fainted. I endeavored to rise for the purpose of ringing the bell, but I had not the power to stir; I essayed to call out, but my tongue refused its office—There I remained in a state of semi-consciousness, looking with fixed gaze at the door. I do not know how long this may have lasted; it could not, however, have been more than a quarter of an hour, perhaps not so much. The lock-handle, in the meantime had not moved any more.

"It must be a mere delusion," I said, "and I should be ashamed to give way to such fancies. I'll call Martha, and she must help me in sleeping them off." I mustered courage, therefore, to rise; but I confess, when I came to turn that mysterious handle, my very heart sunk within me. I conquered my apprehension, however, and turned it without encountering anything very alarming in consequence. I hesitated a little in opening the door, but this feat, too, I summoned up sufficient energy to perform. I looked into the little ante-chamber outside. It was dark, but had been undisturbed. Everything was there as I left it. Ashamed of my silliness, I proceeded towards Martha's chamber, which I found locked. Martha was smoring, and I tried in vain to rouse her. So I made up my mind to return to my own room. I had to pass the landing-place of one of the stair-cases on my return, and I saw in a distant room on the floor beneath, some flashings of a light which seemed to be partially obscured. My alarm now returned, but it was supernatural no longer. The servants had long since retired to rest, and no one could have produced a light with any other than a felonious intent. What was I to do? While I hesitated, the matter was decided; my lamp had attracted the notice of the people below, and they lost no time in running up stairs. In a moment I was surrounded by five men disguised. The tallest of the party knocked the lamp out of my hand, and one of them told me I should not be hurt. They had already secured the plate in common use, but I was commanded to show them the iron safe in the closet next our bedroom, where the rest was deposited. This done, the tall man was in great haste to depart. Something seemed to agitate him with a convulsive gripe, he caught me by the arm.

"Resistance is death," said he. "It is useless for you to ring for the servants, some of them can't hear you, and some of them won't."

A dreadful suspicion flashed across my mind. Can these people any of them belong to my household, and if they do, have they murdered my faithful servants before proceeding to rob the house? I was not allowed much leisure to pause on these reflections, for the tall man demanded to know where I had stowed away my jewelry. He shook me violently, and while doing so, the crape mask fell off of his face, and I could not help crying out: "O, Richard—Richard! can it be you?" He was an old, silver-haired domestic, or factotum of our family, who had dandled me a hundred times upon his knees, and who I had every reason to believe, was at that moment at Brownvale, in New England. Alarmed, the other villains now made off, and I was left alone with Richard.

"This will never do, ma'am," he said. "I took it you were in bed, and tried the handle of the lock of your room. I hoped to have moved away without molesting you, but it's now too late—it's now life for life!"

"You'll not murder me, Richard?" I asked, in an agony of fear.

"Not if I can help it; but I won't let you hang me, either."

"I swear—"

"Nonsense! Give me your jewels. They will put me out of the reach of the law for a few hours, at all events."

"I will take you to them."

"Make haste then."

I tremblingly obeyed, and he made a hasty sweep. He was about to retreat, when the sound of carriages was heard in the street.

"Here they are," he cried, with an oath. "I must chance it through the stables. But no one is to be left behind to tell tales."

He levelled his pistol at me and fired. The ball passed through my hair. I closed upon him and held him with all my might, and he fired again. There was a flash, a dreadful crashing noise, a hasty trampling of feet up stairs; the room was filled with noise and smoke, amid the gloom of which the villain seemed to vanish, and my husband stood over me. I sank into his arms. "My brave Horace!" I said, and burst out laughing.

"Why, my dear wife," said he, "what can bewitch you to stay up so late? See what you have done! Just as I opened the door, you gave a most vigorous jerk forward, which has knocked your lamp off the table, smashed it all to pieces, and singed the prettiest of your curls."

This, then, was the flashing and the crashing, the smoking and the burning, which had drawn visions of robbers and pistols, and all the other terrible things, before my dozing eyes.

I never ate stewed lobster again for supper. It's very nice, but dreadfully indigestible.

UNITARY OSTRICHES.

The hatch of a single ostrich amounts generally to from thirty to forty eggs. Sometimes several couples unite to hatch in partnership, in which case a large hollow is dug out, the centre of which is occupied by the oldest pair of birds, the others ranging themselves around at regular distances. When the eggs have all been laid, they are pushed over to the middle nest, but not mixed; and while the eldest bird is occupied in hatching, the others sit around in the places where the eggs belonging to them were laid respectively. These associations are composed of birds of the same family—the old ones in the centre of the circle being the parents of the others; but the social system is only resorted to in places where herbage is very abundant. As many as a hundred and fifty eggs have been found in one of these combined nests. The Arabs say that those of each couple are disposed in a heap, each heap surmounted by the first egg laid, which is destined for the nourishment of the young ones when they break shell.—Markland.

EPITAPH ON AN INFANT.

Here sin could blight or sorrow lade,
Death came with friendly care;
The opening bud to heaven conveyed,
And bade it blossom there.—COLERIDGE.

TOO BLUNT FOR POLITENESS.

If older people talked as frankly as little children, there would be less deception in the world, under a mask of courtesy. Here is a story of a little boy who said outright, what a great many people feel without saying:

In a family with whom I am acquainted, there is a four-year-old, who rejoices in the name of Harry. Harry's mother had been very sick, and his grandmother had made frequent visits to the house during the time of her daughter's sickness. When the mother recovered, the grandmother, thinking her services no longer needed, discontinued her frequent visits, and only called occasionally. On her visiting the house one evening, she was much surprised at hearing Harry ask why she did not call during the week previous.

"O," said she, "you didn't want me, did you?"

"No," said he, with the most innocent expression imaginable, "but don't you often come when we don't want you?"—Mother's Journal.

SPANISH LADIES.

But here come two Spanish ladies, going to early mass, with the inevitable old duenna—close, watchful, and important as the nurse in Romeo and Juliet—at their heels; for this is a country where hearts are tinder, and sparks are always at hand. They look, as all Spanish ladies do to English eyes, full-dressed; so that a street full of Spanish ladies at the fashionable shopping hour looks very much like an open air ball-room. Their hair is glossy as a blackbird's wing; soft, I dare say, to the lover's hand as a mole's fur. The mantilla gathers round on their shoulders in a cascade of blackness; and their black fans work and winnow in that enchanting manner which, it is said, takes seven years to learn. The Cadiz foot is a proverb—the Cadiz beauty is famous—the Spanish walk is an institution. These ladies float along; walking, as June does, on clouds; there is no stalking tramp here, no tremendous, vigorous exertion of muscles. No, there is only a gliding, a divine passage, not to be accounted for by vulgar, mechanical laws.—Life in Spain.

THE SERFS IN RUSSIA.

The plan proposed by the Russian government for the emancipation of the serfs has been harmoniously adjusted, and is being successfully put in operation. The plan presented to the czar by the Russian nobility, for the emancipation of the serfs, gives them the power to lease lands and make contracts for two years, when it is hoped they will be able to support themselves. The czar's plan contemplated immediate emancipation, and the gift to each serf from his master's territory, of sufficient land to support him. Emancipation is desired by all parties, but the nobles are not willing to give up serfs and land both. The plan of the nobles is understood to have been accepted by the czar.—Boston Traveller.

WE MET BENEATH THE GLARE.

BY WILLIE WARE.

We met beneath the glare
Of artificial light;
'Twas in a scene of gaiety
Upon a festive night.
Gay forms were whirling past
Amid the mazy dance;
Rich music floated round,
The senses to entrance.

Thy face so pure and sweet
I saw that festive night;
Thy form with grace replete,
Thy smile so gay and light.
Thine eyes expressive, mild,
Of heaven's own deepest blue;
Thy hair in ringlets hung
Of a rich auburn hue.

THE WIFE'S TRIAL.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"Mr friend Madaline Carter is coming to visit us, Alice."

Mrs. Lund looked up wonderingly into her husband's face, as he spoke. The name of his friend was a strange one to her. She had never heard him mention it before.

"Madaline Carter!—pray who may she be?" she asked. "And when is she coming?" she added, glancing quickly around the little breakfast-room.

Mr. Lund smiled and tossed a gay, dashing-looking letter into his wife's lap.

"Read for yourself, if you please," he said, "and then tell me how you like it."

With a puzzled expression upon her pleasant face, Mrs. Lund read, what perhaps pleased her, and what perhaps did not, for she had a strong control over her features, and did not allow them to betray her secrets. At any rate, when she finished reading, she drew her white forefinger laughingly across the commencement of the letter, which was, "My dear Arthur Lund," and said:

"Ought I to like that, dear? A strange woman using that 'possessive my,' as we used to say at school, in connection with your name?"

Mr. Lund shook his head. "Do you like the penmanship?" he queried.

"It is very beautiful," she answered, evasively.

"But that is not it—do you like it?" he persisted in saying.

"Yes, well enough. But you know I am seldom drawn very strongly towards gay, handsome people."

"But how do you know that she is gay and handsome?"

"The penmanship indicates as much."

"You are right, Alice, and Arthur knows it. If I were in your place, I wouldn't have her come here at all." The voice came from a low window-seat near by.

"What! is Hester here as early as this in the morning?" said Mr. Lund, evidently somewhat annoyed. "So much comes from settling down within a stone's throw of one's old home. Now, chatterbox, what have you to say of Miss Carter?"

"That if I were in Alice's place, I wouldn't care to have her here—nothing more or less."

"And why not?" queried her brother.

Hester looked annoyed. She did not know whether it would do for her to speak her mind or not. Shaking her head, she said, archly:

"You wouldn't like to have me tell why, Arthur Lund!"

"Nonsense! How thankful I am that I didn't choose such a little goosey as you for a wife. Alice will have a pleasant visit with Miss Carter, I am sure, in spite of your mischievous croakings. Don't mind her, Allie."

Alice stood looking alternately at her husband and young sister-in-law, striving to comprehend the meaning of their words. There was a perplexed expression about her well-formed mouth, and in her clear brown eyes. Whatever her thoughts were, she kept them to herself, for she remarked, after a moment's pause, in an indifferent, careless manner:

"She will be here Wednesday—to-morrow. I will have everything in readiness for her. Never fear, Arthur."

Her husband bent down and kissed her, as she spoke. She returned the caress mechanically, and let her eyes wander searchingly over his face.

"Never mind Hester, Alice. Miss Carter is a very agreeable young lady," Mr. Lund said, as he turned away.

This was all of the morning's conversation, and yet, upon the young wife's heart a shadow had fallen. Going to the window, she watched her husband as he walked down the garden-path to the street. The June sunshine glimmered through the trees upon him. The birds were singing from every bush and shrub. On either hand the sweet-mouthed flowers leaned towards him as if for caresses. This was what Alice's eyes took in; to her heart there was no deeper meaning, perhaps. She was restless and uneasy.

After a while she glanced back towards the breakfast-table, still untouched. Near it, in a heavily-cushioned chair, her sister-in-law Hester sat reading. For a moment, as she looked upon her, an unworthy question framed itself upon her lips. But she did not ask it. She had little need to, in fact, for Hester, anticipating her, closed her book and joined her at the window.

"Don't feel badly about it, Alice," she began. "I'm sure Arthur never cared at all for Madaline—at least, not half as much as he does for you. But at one time they were very intimate, and mother and I were afraid he would marry her. But that was a long time ago!"

Alice smiled.

"Is she beautiful—fascinating—did you say?" she asked.

"Yes, after a fashion. She has splendid eyes; such as will draw one this way and that. She sings well, too, and has a queenly way of doing everything. But she isn't half as sweet as you are, dear."

In this assurance there was something inexpressibly touching to the young wife; at least, her peculiar mood made it so. There was a little fluttering in her throat for a moment, and then her eyes were suddenly dimmed. But she did not speak, only rested her fair hands on the head of her sister, and tried to look down the shaded way that led from the wide, deep window. What a pleasant, happy home this was (so she thought)! How blessed had she been above all other women!

In the perfect arms of memory she was carried back into the past. All the struggles, trials and temptations of her life arose up before her. They were not few, for with her own hands she had made herself a place in the busy world. Not few, I say, but at the early age of twenty-three, she had conquered life. By this, I mean that she knew it as women twice her years seldom do. No matter how. Perhaps it was through her own heart. Love is a great purifier sometimes, and comes like a rapid fire to clear away the rubbish from our eyes. Blessed is he who can read and interpret what he sees! So Alice loved and learned. Standing there, she thought of it. The birth of her love had given her great pain. When she looked at it steadily and well, her heart was brimmed with joy. We ought to thank God every day, we who love, for the sweet privilege of loving. Its return is the gift of another—itsself power.

Why, with all her experience, the thought of Madaline Carter should jar so strongly she did not know. As her husband's friend, she was prepared to welcome her—as her own, she was afraid from her present feelings she never could. That was the dark side of it. Having naturally a sunny heart she soon found the brighter one; and in an hour's time to have looked upon her as she went around her pleasant home, one would have said that the evil spirit was wholly exorcised away.

It was one of the pleasantest of June evenings that Madaline Carter came. With her husband Alice was waiting upon the portico to receive her, when the carriage drove to the door. She had expected to meet a handsome woman, but for so much beauty she was not prepared. For a moment she started back as one will when a sudden light breaks upon them.

"I am happy to welcome you, Madaline!" Mr. Lund said, shaking her hand cordially. And then turning to his wife, he presented her.

Madaline's proud eyes flashed widely open upon her. At a glance she seemed to take in her whole character. How much a single look will express. The one that passed between the two women was fraught with meaning. It said, "I shall hate you!" From Madaline's eyes it was like a swift, strong blaze; from Alice's like the piercing gleam of a star—sharp and lancetlike. This was their meeting, although the while they clasped their white hands together and smiled. While Alice went to the kitchen, Madaline congratulated Mr. Lund upon his happiness, his home, his wife. She did this with a touch of tenderness in her clear, skillfully managed voice.

"I always knew, Arthur," she said, in her old, familiar way, "that sometime you would be nested down in just this way for life. Isn't it delightful?"

"Very," Mr. Lund answered, smiling. "I used to prophesy, too, if I remember rightly," he added, a little archly.

"But you were a false prophet. I know you were then."

"Yes—no! Circumstances entirely justified my conclusions. You'll admit that, I'm sure."

"Not even that."

Mr. Lund smiled again. He was used to her evasive answers. They seemed to please him. From her manner he was led to watch her closely. How beautiful she was! As he thought this, a little tender breeze swept up from the fragrant paths of the past. It was so pleasant that he deemed it harmless. So he turned his face towards it. It grew stronger then, and swept through his heart even. Ah, Mr. Lund, what a dangerously delicious pleasure was that!

Madaline Carter came for a visit of a few days, but they lengthened out into weeks, and still she did not speak of going. At dinner, one day, she said, turning her face towards Mr. Lund, while she fixed her eyes upon Alice:

"I have a friend in the city, or rather an acquaintance, who wishes much to call here. He once knew Mrs. Lund he tells me."

"Ah, and who may your friend be?" was the answer.

"Mr. Ralph Morrison. He is here from Penn on business. Some people call him very attractive. What is your opinion, Mrs. Lund?"

At that moment Arthur raised his eyes to Alice's face. It was so white that it startled him.

"Are you ill?" he asked, rising quickly from his chair.

"No, no—pray be seated," she answered, glancing deprecatingly into his face. "I was a little dizzy—it has quite gone now."

Madaline had watched her closely meanwhile. There was a satisfied, knowing look about her mouth and in her eyes. A poor reader of human faces would have known that there was a certain triumph at her heart.

"I hope the thought of seeing Ralph Morrison does not affect you so, Mrs. Lund," she said, gaily. "I shall feel obliged to warn Arthur of him."

Alice's face crimsoned, and for a moment she did not answer. Even Arthur seemed a little disturbed at her strange appearance, for he raised his eyes to her face, as though anxiously awaiting reply.

"I would advise you to do so, Miss Carter. Perhaps he will appoint you to watch me closely when the gentleman calls," Alice said, at last, laughingly.

"Perhaps so," Madaline answered, opening her eyes to their full width.

"I hate you!" was the look that passed between them then, fierce, deep and strong. Mr. Lund felt it. The swift current touched and thrilled him, but he was like one standing in the dark.

In the evening following, Ralph Morrison called. He was a dark, handsome man, with a smooth tongue and a soft voice. Mr. Lund did not like him, and so gathered his dignity about him like an icy garment. Alice was very quiet, and a little paler than usual; but Madaline was all grace and beauty. Her eyes shone like stars. They were so bright that what was lying in their depths could not be seen. Before he left, Mr. Morrison spoke a few low words to Alice, and as he did so, Madaline scanned the face of Mr. Lund closely.

"They were friends once," she said, seeing how indifferent he was.

He glanced towards them quickly at this, and then looked inquiringly into her face. Her words were simple enough, but they were weighed down with meaning. As if annoyed, she drooped her eyes, and playing with her bracelet, remarked, in a confused, half-troubled way:

"Excuse me—I—I supposed you knew all about their acquaintance, and yet I might have known—never mind. See! Mr. Morrison is bidding Mrs. Lund good night."

He was, indeed! But why should Alice stand blushing before him? Arthur Lund was startled out of his composure for a moment. He turned to Madaline. She had risen from her chair, and stood with her beautiful head bent thoughtfully forward.

"I am quite puzzled," he said, in a low tone. "I must hear more of this," he added, quite forgetting himself.

This was but the beginning of disquiet. With Arthur Lund it increased daily. Between Alice and himself a strange coldness sprang up, but Madaline was everything to him. I do not say that he was conscious of this, but doubting his wife, he made her his friend.

It was so like old times to be with her, he would say to himself. So like the pleasant days of his youth it seemed to listen to her sweet, musical voice. Sometimes he used to wish that she could not read him quite so easily; that she did not know quite so well of the little trouble between Alice and himself. But after awhile he ceased to think of this even, and Alice went further from him. How would it end? As the beautiful enchantress willed perhaps. But the good angels of earth are many. They watch as well as the bad.

Madaline told Arthur that Mr. Morrison and Alice had been lovers once. She said this in an artless, innocent way, as though she did not half comprehend what she was saying. But she drank in every word eagerly.

"Why did they not marry?"

"There had been a misunderstanding between them—they had not quite comprehended each other," was the answer.

"And now?"

"O they could see how it was now, of course. People could always see when it was too late to remedy an evil."

"Yes, yes—but had they loved deeply?"

"Yes."

The word came with a sigh. At that moment it fell welcomingly upon his ears. Madaline had loved him deeply, perhaps, he thought. Involuntarily he raised her hand to his lips.

Ah, Arthur—Arthur Lund! could you have seen the white face bent towards you at that moment—could you have seen the terrible look of agony that passed over it, you might have stayed your feet from the path which they were treading. The beautiful hand would have scorched your lips like fire!

Softly, noiselessly, Alice stole up the wide stairway to her chamber. In the darkness she fell upon her knees, clasping her hands across her forehead. Her prayer was:

"Be merciful—merciful, dear God!"

"It is so cruel, so miserably cruel!"

So Hester Lund kept saying to herself, as she sat by Alice bedside during the illness that followed that night. But Alice did not speak at all, only mutely with her large brown eyes. She kept her white face hidden in the pillow, and muffled the heavy sobs that broke so constantly upon her lips. At first, Arthur came to see her, but Hester suggested to him one day, as she saw him nearing his wife's chamber, with a troubled expression upon his face, his mouth stern and his brows knit, that it would be better for him to allow Alice a few days of uninterrupted quiet. He looked at her keenly as she spoke, and his fine lips curled into a smile.

"Then I am a trouble to Alice?" he said, in a low tone, scarcely above a whisper.

"I did not say that you were. But something troubles her, I am sure of that," was the quick answer.

"I do not doubt there is. I have ample proof."

"And so have I!" retorted Hester, under her breath, turning away.

This conversation was in the upper hall. At the door of her chamber, which was slightly ajar, Madaline Carter listened to it. Her beautiful face gleamed in its triumphant joy.

"We will see—we will see, Alice Lund, who conquers!" she said, clasping her hands together, and bending her regal head upon them. "To fail is to die, and that you begin to feel! But for this little quick-eyed Hester I must keep a sharp lookout."

When Madaline went down to dinner that day she wore her sweetest smiles.

"How was Mrs. Lund?" she asked of Hester.

"Very well," was the cool reply, given with a corresponding glance.

"Would she be down stairs soon?"

"That had not been thought of much yet."

"She (Madaline) would have visited her, but she feared that she might disturb her."

"She most certainly would," was the prompt, decisive answer.

Arthur Lund raised his eyes in surprise. Hester looked him firmly in the face. Madaline watched them smilingly. "I must see to that Hester," she thought to herself.

Ah! that would have been well, Miss Madaline.

At the expiration of a week, Alice insisted upon going down stairs. Hester protested that she was too weak, and even Arthur expressed a fear that she might endanger her health by so doing. But she was firm in her resolution, and so at tea-time that day, she took her place at the table again. She was looking poorly. None felt this more keenly than did Hester, and in consequence she hated Madaline Carter most deeply. How the little play would end she did not know, but she thought to herself, that in it she would not be an idle character—that she would help the plot to a speedy denouement, if possible.

How strange it was that Ralph Morrison, who had absented himself from the house during Alice's illness, should make his appearance on the first evening which she spent down stairs. To Arthur Lund it was inexplicable. To all appearances, it was the same to Madaline. But Hester was content to watch without wondering.

Alice was lying upon the sofa when Mr. Morrison was announced. Her husband was near enough to her to see the faint color arise in her cheeks at the mention of his name. With a quick, hurried glance about him, Mr. Morrison bent over Alice and whispered a few words. When he turned away, Hester went at once to her.

"Tell me what he said, Allie dear," she began, taking her hand.

"That he was happy to see me in the parlor again," she answered, raising her eyes wonderingly to Hester's face.

"And was that all?"

"All?" (still wonderingly.)

"That is well. Sometime you shall know why I asked you."

Madaline clenched her white hands together, and under her breath cursed Hester Lund. For what, she knew not. The girl's face was unreadable as a sealed book. There was nothing to be gathered from that. Perhaps her step was a little firmer, her head, always finely carried, took a more confident poise, as she turned from Alice to her seat again. There was something, at any rate, that jarred with Madaline's thoughts. All around, it was an unpleasant evening. But Mr. Morrison was never more witty or entertaining. To Hester it seemed dull, and she knew that it was the same to her brother, that aside from Alice he cared little for the company. His eyes constantly sought her face. His head was bent towards her as he spoke. Once in a while, as though suddenly conscious of betraying too deep an interest, he would turn his face towards Madaline, but it would be for a few moments only, and then to Alice again.

When he turned to leave the room that night, he drew his kerchief from his coat pocket, and as he did so, a delicate little note dropped to the carpet, close at Arthur's feet. Mr. Lund stooped to pick it up. Of a sudden his eye caught the superscription. It was in the fine, delicate penmanship of Alice! He put his foot on the note and bowed Mr. Morrison from the room. For a moment he stood as white as marble. The perspiration gathered in large drops upon his forehead. His lips were tremulous, but not with speech. He knew then, when she seemed to go forever from him, how deeply and well he had loved Alice; that his passion for Madaline was no more to that, than is the first breath of spring to the rich glow of midsummer. He gathered the note in his hand and crushed it there.

"What is it, Arthur?" whispered Hester, softly.

He waved her away with his hand. His eye sought Alice.

"Not now," she said.

He turned around. Madaline had stolen quietly from the room.

"Yes, now!" he said, almost fiercely.

Alice looked up, and he went to her. "You are no longer my wife!" he said, looking into her white face, as he spoke.

She started up wildly. As if to crush her down again, he held the note before her eyes. She read:

"DEAR RALPH:—I shall be down stairs this evening. If you love me come! ALICE."

"I never wrote it. Arthur—Arthur! believe me," she cried, sinking back upon the sofa in a deep swoon.

"You have killed her!" said Hester, as he turned away.

He rushed out of the house, down the gravelled pathway into the street. He did not know or care where or which way he went. So he wandered about till nearly midnight. He was drinking from the same cup that he had pressed to Alice's lips.

"Morrison's heart-blood should pay for the wrong!" he said to himself in the heat of his mad passion. Then he thought of Madaline. Instinctively he cursed her, and then himself in turn. At last, he turned towards home. He gained it by a roundabout way that led him to a back gate situated in the remotest part of his grounds. He entered it noiselessly. Walking slowly up the smooth path, densely shaded upon either side, he caught the sound of voices. His first thought was, that Alice might be there keeping tryst with Ralph Morrison. He listened shudderingly. Behind the thick screen of rustling trees and shrubbery, Morrison and Madaline were talking. How long they had been there he had no idea. But they were talking of him, he thought. Hearing his name mentioned, he moved more closely towards them.

"The plot deepens," Madaline said. "I had no idea that it would work so well. You have acted your part nobly, Ralph."

"Why should I not? Alice Thurlow did not turn from my heart's best love for nothing. I swore to her then, if time was spared to me, I would strike at the tenderest part of her life. The blow is deep, she thinks, now, but she has not felt it yet! Do you remember how white she grew when I first spoke to her? She had not forgotten my words. They will go to her grave with her."

"I pray they may," said Madaline, in a tone of deep passion, "and as for me, I care not how soon. She took my heart away from me, when she wedded Arthur Lund. I have been a fiend ever since. I stood at the parlor door to-night when he held the note before her eyes. How happy I was, when I saw that agonized look break over her white face. She little thought who had mixed the fiery draught that was raised to her lips. And Arthur—"

"You are a strange woman, Madaline," said Morrison. "I like your strength and bravery. But you are shivering with the cold. Let me lead you to the house."

"No, I am not cold," she answered. "Life is too deep for that to-night. This revenge is maddening, intoxicating! My brain is on fire! My heart seems burning out!"

"I must insist upon your going in."

He said something more, but Arthur could not quite distinguish what it was. Something about living until the victory was entirely won, was the burden of his words as they moved away.

When Arthur reached the house, he found Alice asleep. He bent over her couch. He could see then how sadly she was changed—how pale and thin she had grown. She turned upon her pillow, and whispered his name brokenly. Tears gathered in his eyes. His heart was full.

"Forgive me!" he cried, as she opened her eyes upon him.

"O, Arthur, you wronged me! I did not write that note. I do not love any one but you. You are all that I have in the great, wide world!"

He took her hands tenderly in his, and in broken sentences told her what he had learned. And more, he told her of this strange infatuation, now gone forever; and he promised, with the help of God, to be all in the years to come that he had been in the past, tender, true and loving.

The next morning he carried Alice down to the breakfast-room in his arms, and placed her close beside him at the table. Madeline looked wonderingly upon him. She was so taken by surprise, that she forgot the part she was playing.

"I did not think to see you down, Mrs. Lund."

Arthur bit his lips. "Are you quite well this morning?" he asked, raising his eyes to her face.

"O yes, quite well!"

"Then you did not take cold last evening?"

"Take cold?" she repeated, changing color.

"Yes, Mr. Morrison was apprehensive that you would. And it was extremely careless of you standing out in the night air so long. Did you go out immediately after leaving the parlor?"

"No—that is—"

"You stopped to glance through the parlor door while Alice read your note, perhaps?" he queried, in the same cool, collected tone.

She flashed her eyes upon him. They shone like balls of fire in her great anger. She arose from the table. Trying to speak, her rage nearly choked her. "I hate you, Arthur Lund!" she said.

"Indeed!" he answered. "Your feelings are emblematic of change. My regards to Mr. Morrison when you meet him again. Alice and I would be pleased to have him call at his leisure."

She swept out of the room without answering. An hour later she was on her way to the depot. She did not stop to thank her kind host and hostess for their protracted hospitality, or even to bid them a good morning. For a long time they sat at the breakfast-table, Arthur and Alice, while Hester read by the window. The breezes came in deftly, laden with summer's dying perfume, the canary whistled and trilled in its cage, the sunshine threw its golden lines farther and farther across the snowy linen of the table. The young wife smiled—the shadow had risen.

SAVE YOUR PAMPHLETS.—Much valuable matter is lost by a neglect to bind and preserve the pamphlet literature of the day. Dr. Johnson gives a hint to American as well as to English librarians when he says: "There is no nation, perhaps, in which it is so necessary, as in our own, to assemble, from time to time, the smaller tracts and fugitive pieces, which are occasionally published; for, besides the general subjects of inquiry which are cultivated by us, in common with every learned nation, our constitution in church and state naturally gives birth to a multitude of performances, which would either not have been written, or would not have been made public in any other place."

WOMAN IN ADVERSITY.

Women should be trusted and confided in as wives, mothers, and sisters. They have a quick perception of right and wrong, and, without always knowing why, read the present and future, characters and acts, designs and probabilities, where man sees no letter or sign. What else do we mean by the adage, "mother wit" save that woman has a quicker perception and readier invention than man? How often, when man abandons the helm in despair, woman seizes it, and carries the home ship through the storm! Man often flies from home and family to avoid impending poverty and ruin. Woman seldom, if ever, forsook home thus. Woman never evaded mere temporal calamity by suicide or desertion. The proud banker, rather than live to see his poverty gazetted, may blow out his brains and leave wife and children to want, protectorless. Loving woman would have counselled him to accept poverty, and live to cherish his family and retrieve his fortune. Woman should be counselled and confided in. It is the beauty and glory of her nature that it instinctively grasps at and clings to the truth and right. Reason, man's greatest faculty, takes time to hesitate before it decides; but woman's instinct never hesitates in its decision, and is scarcely ever wrong where it has even chances with reason. Woman feels where man thinks, acts where he deliberates, hopes where he despairs, and triumphs where he falls.—Country Gentleman.

TYROLESE BRAVERY.

We now arrived at Prutz, and felt we were on classic ground. We crossed a bridge over the foaming torrent. Up to this point the Tyrolese once allowed the enemy to advance. No sign of resistance met them. They heard no sound but the rumbling of the river below, until a mysterious voice shouted from some hidden spot, "Shall we begin?" and the word "No," echoed down the pass. Onward the enemy marched—the defile became narrower—there was only room for the torrent and the road between the mountains. And now a resolute voice was heard to cry, "In the name of the Holy Trinity cut all loose!" when rocks, stones and trees rattled down the steep sides of the mountains into the very midst of the enemy, while the Tyrolese riflemen started from their hiding places, and helped to pour destruction on the foe. It is recorded, that an old man who was thus plying his deadly weapon, was attacked by three soldiers. He fired and killed the first, with the butt-end of his weapon he beat down the second, then he grasped the third, and leapt with him into the gulf, shouting, "For God and Tyrol!"—*Through the Tyrol to Venice. ## LOVE.

When vexed by cares and harassed by distress,
The storms of fortune chill thy soul with dread,
Let Love, consoling Love, still sweetly blow,
And his assuasive balm benignly shed;
His downy plume o'er thy pillow spread,
Shall lull thy weep & sorrows to repose.
To love the tender heart hath ever fled,
As on its mother's breast the infant throws
Its sobbing face, and there in sleep forgets its woes.

THE PINE.

BY LESLIE MORSE.

When gusty winds whirl in the roaring pine,
 And tossing its hair as if drunken with wine,
 Singing and singing some plaintive bassoon,
 Each treesy harp walling and walling in tune:
 Now faintly and low the soft monotone dies,
 Then shrieking with elfy locks swung in the skies.
 Tell me, O pine-tree, art thou the haunt
 Of spirits, who sigh with a shivering chant
 O'er hopes which the young heart cherished and fed,
 And dreams which alas! in a mockery died—
 Whose ghosts have now come, all frantic and pale,
 To sigh in thy fringe, O pine, with a wail?

Æolian pine, on a million of strings
 Thy music awakens and o'er thee rings:
 Now shrilly and loud as a war-note's rush,
 Then the pean grows soft as a twilight hush;
 Humming and humming some old love note
 That flowers on the stream with their pale fingers wrote,
 When it wandered away from their loving embrace,
 To crown with its pearl-foam a later won face.

O, many an hour 'neath the pine-tree I've lain
 On the green-waving hill o'erlooking the plain,
 And the poplars marked, in the windy play,
 Flash up their linings of silver and gray;
 To the sapphire skies all smiling above,
 And the soft yellow air so mellow with love.
 And athwart it the wild bird, sauntering, flings,
 The amethyst plumes on the edge of her wings;
 And the brown bee's song, as he swims like a boat
 On the amber sea, has a murmurous note;
 And among all the arches, and all of the aisles,
 Where the sunlight creeps with its golden smiles,
 And Echo steals on with her pale lips apart,
 Comes music that wakens the dreams of the heart—
 Breathing of love, and of hope, and desire,
 Passions which melt all the soul in their fire.

Silver dews falling among the white flowers,
 Nightingales' songs in the rose-colored bowers,
 The reeds and the rushes, with moonlight waves,
 By starry winds beaten in musical staves,
 And the twilight rain—O, they all combine
 In the music that plays o'er the emerald pine!

THE DEAD MAN'S SIGNATURE.

BY MARK A. OSGOOD.

THE sun had gone down behind the distant hills; even the last faint streaks of purple and gold which for a time lingered in the western horizon, had melted away, and the shades of evening were fast coming on. The day had been an unusually warm and pleasant one for December, but a sudden change had taken place in the weather; dark, angry, windy clouds had arisen in the north, and were fast creeping over the clear, azure heavens, and the howling, whistling blasts came sweeping through the naked trees, bereaving them of the last remnant of leaves which remained of their summer's glory, and whirling them around and around with amazing velocity, at last deposited them, with a multitude of their dried, seared companions, amid the clefts of rocks, by the walls and roadsides, beneath the hedges and in the valleys, and in other receptacles prepared for their wintry abode.

It was upon this evening, so dismal, dark and cheerless, that two men might have been seen standing just within the narrow confines of an old, dilapidated shed, one of the appendages of a large, substantial brick house, engaged in earnest conversation. One was a ruffianly-looking man of about thirty, of medium height, short and thick-set, with coarse, irregular features, long black hair, and heavy, frowning brows, from beneath which a pair of eyes gleamed bright and piercing as an eagle's. The other was a person of an altogether different look and mien. In his countenance both intellect and art were expressed; his light, springy gait, free and easy manners, ready command of language, and especially his rapid, graceful gestures, all denoted a man from the higher walks of life.

"Dixon," said the villanous-looking individual I have just described, as he cast an uneasy glance around to assure himself that no listeners were near, "can it be accomplished?"

"Without the shadow of a doubt."

"And there is no danger of detection?"

"Not if you've got the wit of a goose to carry it out," said the other, drily.

"Have you matured your plan?"

"Yes."

"And you swear to stand by me through thick and thin, come weal or come woe?"

"Provided you'll give me a good taste of the chink after we get it. I don't go into such business for nothing," answered Dixon.

"I am not the man to bicker about a few hundreds, when thousands are at stake. Give me a lift, and you shall set your own price. But what is your plan?"

"The old man you say lies in the northwest chamber?"

"Yes."

"Does any one sleep in the immediate vicinity?"

"Only old Grannie Reed, and she has been deaf as an adder these dozen years."

"So much the better for our purpose. 'Well, you must affect for once a little filial affection—'"

"That's rather a hard matter, but when gold is in question—" interrupted his companion.

"Silence, you fool!" exclaimed Dixon, impatiently. "Will you take up the whole time talking? Hear me, man: thus far he's had the whole town in to see him, but say to the old woman and the family that you consider the chamber of death ought to be free from intrusion; tell them that as this is the last night your father's remains lie unburied, as an affectionate and dutiful son, you desire the privilege of performing the sad office of watching by them in private, and that for this night you wish to be left to the free and undisturbed indulgence of your own sad reflections. Well, after you have got them all off, do you at precisely twelve o'clock place a lamp in the window as a signal that all is ready. I'll be outside with my men waiting for it, and we'll come and knock three times lightly on the front door. Then come down and let us in. Now don't go to blustering about and make such a racket as will wake up all the mice in the house—for if we get caught in the scrape, it will go hard with us. I'll come with the papers all made out, to convey the property into your hands. I am an old hand at fac-similes; I'll take your father's dead hand within mine and affix his signature to it. It shall be so exact an imitation, that even a Philadelphia lawyer can't detect it from the genuine. Dick Howe and Joe Maynard, my clerks, shall come with me as witnesses. That's necessary, you know, for if the family go to raising a rumpus and carry the affair into court, we must have something to fall back upon, and they be there to swear before judge and jury that the will is both legal and genuine, signed, sealed and delivered into my hands by old Jacob Scneider himself. Now you've my plan, what's to hinder its being carried into execution?"

"Nothing," returned the other, musingly; "only two men and yourself to pay will draw pretty well from my pockets."

"Fool!" muttered Dixon to himself. "I believe, upon my word, the fellow would hang himself to make a cent! Tight, miserly scoundrel, if I undertake the job, I'll make a good deep hole in his coffers."

Reader, you have now obtained an insight into the character of two of the principal actors in my story, and if you will go back with me a little, I will introduce you to others who are henceforth to figure largely in this sketch.

Jacob Scneider was a German by birth, a farmer by vocation, and a miser by reputation, by nature and education. He had emigrated early in life, and by dint of great shrewdness and economy, had managed to purchase a large tract of land, rich, fertile and productive, upon the beautiful banks of the Susquehannah. This land had taken a sudden rise, and had doubled and trebled in value, till Jacob Scneider became what the world calls a man of property—worth somewhere in the neighborhood of eighty or one hundred thousand dollars. But if a high estimate was placed upon his estates, a very low estimation was certainly placed upon his character. He was parsimonious and miserly to the last degree. Gold was the sole and ultimate object of his existence. It was gold—bright, shining, glittering gold, for which he thirsted and hungered; gold—which had warped his mind, bent his tall, athletic form, brought deep furrows to his brow, turned his hair prematurely white. And now he had gone and left it—gone into the presence of the most high God, to receive at the bar of judgment his reward or condemnation! What that sentence will be, eternity alone will reveal. He had lived unhonored and unloved, and there were none to mourn for him or lament his death, and "only those who inherited his estate rejoiced."

Besides his widow who survived him, Jacob Scneider left two sons to receive his patrimony. To say that Thomas, the elder, was his favorite and exact counterpart, moulded in the same mould, is sufficient; but Harry, the younger, was as different from him as night is from day. He was handsome, smart and intelligent; and through the liberality of a wealthy bachelor uncle, his mother's brother, he had received a good education. If Thomas was his father's favorite, Harry was his pride; but he had in some degree become alienated from him—he obstinately refused to adopt his peculiar ways of thinking, and to submit his business to his supervision. And after a stormy interview in which Harry asked of his father pecuniary aid and was stoutly denied, he was too proud to recur to the same subject again, and after leaving the "paternal mansion," commenced business for himself upon a small scale.

Between Harry and his brother, no feelings either of affection or sympathy ever existed. Their characters were as far apart as the north pole is from the south; their views, feelings, tastes, wholly unlike. Thomas had long regarded him with a jealous eye, and deep-rooted feelings of animosity had for years rankled in his breast. Although the mere common civilities only were exchanged, yet they had hitherto lived peacefully and harmoniously beneath the same roof; but scarcely had the breath of life departed from the body of old Jacob Scneider, before Thomas was plotting and caballing in his heart means and ways by which he could appropriate to himself the greater portion of the old man's wealth. One half of the inheritance, except his mother's third, rightfully and lawfully belonged to Harry; and how to get full and entire possession of it, was the thought that occupied his soul by day and night. He had plenty of art and roguery, and had contrived in his business transactions to "feather his own nest" in cases equally difficult; but to accomplish this, required not only a long head but a thorough knowledge of certain points of law of which he was ignorant. But Lawyer Dixon was a man cunning and shrewd, and, like himself, ready to resort to any means to satisfy his unbounded love of gain, and to him he determined to apply. As he expected, the wily lawyer greedily caught at the bait; a bargain was immediately struck up, an exorbitant price was agreed upon, to be paid to Dixon out of the profits in case he succeeded in attaining his object, and a scheme devised. What that scheme was, has already been unfolded to our readers.

After his long conversation with Dixon in the shed, Thomas returned to the house and took his accustomed seat by the fire, and waited impatiently for the time for the family to retire.

"I'll sit up to-night and watch by my father's remains," he said to the kind-hearted neighbors who came to volunteer their services. "He has been a good and tender parent to me, and it will afford me a melancholy gratification to watch by his lifeless body the last night it remains with us."

"It's natural," said old Grandmother Reed, with a sigh. "Thomas and his father always did take to one another amazingly. But you must be careful and keep the doors shut, and the windows all down, for they say cats haunter dreffully after dead bodies, and I've hearn 'em tell how they'd break through the windows and come down the chimneys to get at 'em."

Half an hour later, Thomas Scneider found himself sitting alone in the chamber of death. His father's cold, lifeless remains lay stretched out before him shrouded and ready for the grave. The room was cold, cheerless and dismal; a lamp burned dimly on the table, adding still more to the already forbidding, funereal aspect of the apartment. Without, the wind was howling and whistling mournfully, shaking the casements with every blast; the rain, too, was pouring down in torrents, and came beating against the windows with tremendous force.

Thomas Scneider was a man of tried courage and daring, but somehow, to night every sound startled him; the creaking of the shutters, the barking of the house-dog, even the striking of the kitchen clock, almost made him spring from his seat. But the hours slowly passed away and twelve o'clock came—the signal for his lamp to be placed in the window to announce that all was ready. Then followed three quick successive raps at the outer door, and Thomas Scneider arose, slipped quickly and noiselessly down, and cautiously opened the door. Three men entered with moccasined feet, and, with a tread light and noiseless as that of a panther, rapidly ascended the staircase which led to the dead man's room.

Closing the door carefully after him, Dixon drew from his pocket a will he had previously prepared, and approaching the bed, removed the sheet which had been spread over the corpse, and taking one of the hands which was lying upon the breast, he placed a pen between the thumb and finger, and guiding its motions, wrote in a large, bold hand the name of Jacob Scneider. This done, he replaced the sheet and hand in its former position, and with a satisfied smile, and a significant nod, passed the paper to his comrades.

"There," said he, in a whisper, "I defy all the lawyers in the State to prove its falsity! The old man writes as well as if his soul was in his body."

A triumphant smile lighted up the grim visage of Thomas Scneider, and his keen, eagle eye dilated with joy, as it fell upon the forged signature—so perfect and exact a counterfeit, that he himself, if he had not been a witness of the operation, would never for a moment have had a doubt of its truth. This done, Dixon replaced the will in his pocket, and with his comrades, withdrew as silently and cautiously as they had entered. Thus far, all worked well.

One week passed by—the funeral rites had been solemnized—all that remained of old Jacob Scneider had been consigned to the cold and narrow grave—and what was to be done with the gold he had left behind him? was the question which followed his decease. He had debased his soul to obtain it, and he had gone now where the vast treasures he had accumulated here, would avail him nothing. Who would now be the possessor of his wealth?—had he provided liberally for his widow?—had he left a will? Such were the questions which traversed from mouth to mouth, and both Gossip and Rumor were busy in solving them. At last a report was in circulation that in Lawyer Dixon's hands the old gentleman had entrusted his will, and curiosity and expectation were upon tiptoe to fathom its contents. For once Rumor, with her thousand tongues, was right. Lawyer Dixon had in his possession a will, one of his own manufacture, which had been signed, sealed and witnessed, as we have seen. But now a week had passed since the funeral, and the worthy gentleman of the legal profession thought it expedient to present himself at the house and duly inform the family of its existence.

Great indeed was the astonishment of Mrs. Scnider and Harry, when the fact became known. Old Jacob had, all through his life, a great horror of will-making, and had always entertained the superstitious notion that death invariably followed the making of a will; and although he had been repeatedly urged by his wife to make some final disposition of his property, he had never as yet yielded to her importunities. Moreover, Dixon was a man whom he had been frequently known to declare was trickish and knavish—one who, with soft words and pretty compliments, stole into the hearts of the ignorant and unwary, as a wolf steals into a fold at night to plunder and devour. These circumstances made it all the more improbable, to the family of Jacob Scnider, that with his thorough knowledge of the character and cunning of this man, he should have selected him, of all others, to repose confidence in and make sole executor of his will.

"It is false!" exclaimed Harry, in an excited tone, the moment the visage of the sleek attorney was fairly outside the door. "It is a shameful, deep-laid plot, dyed with fraud and lies, to get into his own empty pockets a few hundreds of my father's money. But I'll defeat his object! I'll riddle to the bottom this mystery, and bring the villain to justice!"

"Pretty complimentary!" sung out the smooth, silvery voice of Dixon, who it seems had not stirred from the door where he had been an attentive listener. "Well, break up the will, prove it a forgery, and bring me to justice, if you can! I defy all the power in the State to do it."

One o'clock, that afternoon, was the time appointed for the reading of the will in presence of the Scnidors and the two clerks who had witnessed it. Dixon read in a slow, solemn tone, what he emphatically asserted was the last will and testament of Jacob Scnider.

"To my dearly beloved wife, Mary Scnider, who has been a willing and able helpmate, and has, for thirty-three years shared with me the joys and sorrows of life—to her I leave just what the law allows, were it to take its course, viz., the income of a third of my whole property, which, after her decease, is to descend to my elder son Thomas.

"In view of the fact that my younger son Harry has an uncle, a worthy and wealthy bachelor of position and influence, who for years has regarded him in the light of a son, and has frequently declared his intention of making him his sole heir and legatee, I have deemed it unnecessary to make further provision for him than to bequeath to him a few mementoes of respect and affection, viz., a twenty-dollar gold piece—the first I ever earned—which is to be found in the upper drawer of my old red chest, sewed up in the top of a blue stocking, the sword and other military equipments belonging to my deceased brother John, and worn by him on the bloody field of Waterloo, four pewter plates, the dying gift of my grandmother, and the old family Bible. To bestow upon him these precious relics of the past, is the strongest proof of affection I can give him.

"To my elder son Thomas, as he has no expectation to rely upon, I give and bequeath the remainder of my property, my bank and railroad stock, real and personal estate, except the bequests I have already mentioned. If my sons desire that my body shall rest quietly in the grave, let there be no strife or contention in regard to the settlement of my affairs. Let my wishes be executed to the letter; otherwise, my grieved spirit shall haunt and harass them till the day of their death."

A silence still as midnight followed the reading; dissatisfaction was expressed on every countenance, and a murmur of discontent and doubt ran around the assembled company.

"Would you like to see the will?" politely asked Dixon, as he handed it to Harry, who was standing leaning against the mantel shelf silent and motionless as a statue.

"My father never made that will, sir," he said calmly and composedly, as he fixed his clear blue eye full upon the lawyer's face.

"Do you mean to insinuate a doubt as to its genuineness?" asked Dixon, his lips quivering with rage as he spoke.

"No, I insinuate nothing—for insinuations are unnecessary. It is a bold-faced scheme of fraud and knavery, got up by villains and rascals to deprive me of my lawful, hereditary rights. But it shall be defeated. Sir, it shall go before judge and jury; my father's sentiments shall be known—"

"Not so fast, young man," interrupted Dixon, with the blandest smile possible. "Averse as your father always was to the making of his will, yet a short time previous to his death certain events occurred to produce an entire alteration in his views on the subject. Hear me!" he exclaimed, seeing Harry about to speak. "Just nine weeks before his death, he came to my office; a deep-seated gloom had settled upon his countenance, and his soul, he said, was oppressed with sorrow. 'Friend Dixon,' he began, 'my end is approaching. I have been warned of it by raps and dreams and unmistakable signs.'

"'Pooh!' said I; 'don't give way to idle fears. You're hale and hearty as I am, and likely to live these dozen years.'

"He shook his head mournfully. 'Death has sent his forerunner to warn me of my approaching end, and something tells me,' he added, laying his hand upon his heart, 'that the warning is true. Yesterday I was sitting all alone by the kitchen fire, pondering upon the events of the day, when I heard the town clock strike twelve. I looked to see if the clock on the mantel-shelf agreed in time, and saw both the minute and the hour hand pointing directly to the figure of 12, then slowly both hands began to reverse their motions till they fell back down to the figure of 6. That means something, thought I; some invisible power is at work. It's the harbinger of evil—"coming events cast their shadows before;" and as I wondered and conjectured, the pendulum began to go with astonishing velocity, swinging to and fro, beating against the case at each successive motion. Then the striking commenced—one, two, three, four, up to sixty-nine times—slow and measured as the tolling of the bell. Then a rapping followed right on the wall over my head; just sixty-nine distinct raps were given. There, thought I, I am as good as a dead man; and that night I dreamed that in just six weeks, at just half past six o'clock, I shall breathe my last. My mortal career is almost ended, and all that remains for me is to close up my earthly concerns and prepare to meet my God. I wish you to write my will, to be my executor, but to keep all knowledge of its existence from my family till all is over."

Upon concluding his story, Lawyer Dixon, with ill-suppressed triumph and pleasure expressed in his face, called his clerks to swear themselves as witnesses of it. Then turning to Harry he demanded what further proof he needed to convince him of its authenticity?

Harry took the will; every letter was perfect in its formation, every quirk and mark exactly as his father was in the habit of making, and yet he was unconvinced! He felt there was an inexplicable mystery in the affair, and that to solve it he must enter an intricate labyrinth, and solve a deep, skilfully laid plot with an artful, designing lawyer to contend with on one side, and a selfish, avaricious brother on the other.

"Annie, my love, I have told you of the blight that has fallen upon my prospects. Had I known that I was to be basely robbed of my patrimony,

I would never have asked you to unite your destiny with mine. My love for you cannot be crushed out of my soul—it is a part of my very existence—but it should have gone down to the grave unrevealed and unsuspected by any one. I hoped to have been able to offer with my heart a home and a position in life worthy of your acceptance, one in which your birth and education so eminently fits you to adorn; but it is all over now—the golden bubble has burst, and I have now only a strong arm and a willing heart to depend upon."

"And are not these sufficient to ensure success? Cannot an humble home with love like ours be a happy one?" asked Annie, smiling, as she gazed with eyes full of admiration and tenderness into the face of her lover.

"Can you relinquish the luxuries to which you have been so long accustomed, and walk with me the rough pathway in life?" said Harry, with a sigh.

"Are not our lives," replied Annie, reproachfully, "so interwoven that the fluctuating tide of fortune must fail to affect us? O, Harry, you little know the depth and strength of a woman's love, if you think that the loss of a few paltry thousands can wean her heart from the man she loves?"

It seemed as if the very fountains of love and tenderness within the soul of Harry had suddenly burst forth; with glistening eyes and an overflowing heart, he answered:

"If my golden charms of happiness have vanished like vapor before me, so long as I possess the priceless treasure of your love, my darling, I am rich; yes, richer than all the mines of California could make me without it, were they to open and unfold their treasures at my feet. I would fain linger longer by my Annie's side; but it's late and duty bids me go."

Then with a few more words of endearment, a few more assurances of love, and a long, fond embrace, Harry turned to the door and sprang lightly upon his horse, already saddled and bridled, and with a touch of the reins and a parting wave of the hand to Annie, rode rapidly away.

Business of a two-fold nature had brought Harry Scneider to Harrisburg. His principal and paramount object was to obtain legal advice in regard to the feasibility of prosecuting a lawsuit, by which he hoped to establish his own hereditary claims, as one of the heirs at law. The next, and not unpleasant duty he had to perform was to visit his affianced bride, Annie Morris, to whom he had been betrothed for more than a year.

It was a full three hours' ride to the old homestead, and Harry set off upon a brisk canter in the hope of reaching it by eleven o'clock. It was a cold, but calm, clear evening. The moon shone out in all its brilliancy, and the twinkling stars lighted up his lonely way, and as he gazed into the far-off distant heavens and contemplated upon the infinite power, the majesty and glory of the great Creator, his soul was lost in a strange bewilderment of wonder and adoration. Then he thought of his loved Annie, who, with true womanly love and devotion, had poured the balm of consolation into his sad, dispirited soul, and had yielded to his guidance and keeping all the pure, warm affections of her young heart, and of his father, whose grave was unwatered by a single tear, and of the inexplicable mystery which hung over their final settlement of his property.

A full hour had passed in one profound, continual reverie, when the clattering of a horse's hoofs behind him made him turn to see who was approaching. But what was it that made all the blood recede from his face, his eyes almost start from their sockets, the bridle drop from his hand, and his feet shake in the stirrups? Harry Scneider was a man of determined bravery. There was no deed of daring he dared not attempt, no danger, however imminent, he feared to face. Had he suddenly encountered a powerful foe, wielding the implements of death and destruction, he would have shed his life's blood before surrendering; but to be unexpectedly brought in contact with spirits from the unseen world, clothed in bodily form, was enough to appall the stoutest heart.

In the rider of the coal black steed, he recognized his father, clad in his accustomed garb, a gray coat, blue homespun pants, heavy leathern shoes, and a large, broad-rimmed hat, beneath which his thin, silvered locks were plainly visible; his face could not be distinctly seen except that a deadly pallor overshadowed it, and the hand that guided the spirited animal was dexterous and skilful as ever; faster and faster he rode, and nearer and nearer he came, and a voice hoarse and solemn as the tomb called out:

"Harry Scneider, Harry Scneider!"

Terrified and horror-stricken at this unexpected apparition, Harry's first impulse was to touch the reins of his horse and fly; then commenced a regular John Gilpin race—the ghost of the departed was pursuing the living—hills, valleys, meadows and pastures were swept past as a ball is shot out of a cannon.

Fleeter and fleeter rode Harry; still the spectre relentlessly followed, and always keeping just such a distance in his rear; but the courage which had momentarily forsook him, soon returned—his curiosity was excited. If it was indeed the ghost of his dead parent, why run from it? If the object of his nocturnal visitor was to terrify him, he certainly had attained it; if it was his intention to rob or murder him, he could have done it with far less trouble to himself, and no possible chance at exposure; at any rate, he would confront his unwelcome companion, whether friend or foe, and with this determination he reined in his horse, wheeled suddenly around, and with a bold face and resolute bearing, demanded "who he was, and why he sought him?"

The spectre seemed taken by surprise at this unexpected movement.

"I am Jacob Scneider, your father," he answered, in the same hollow tones, as he made a halt, and stationed himself at a short distance from Harry, beneath the spreading branches of a majestic oak, where the pale light of the moon could not fall upon his face. "O, Harry, my son Harry, my youngest born, the spirit of your dead father is grieved and troubled! It cannot rest in the grave so long as there is strife and contention about the poor, insignificant heaps of gold he has left behind him. Gold, gold, it is the root of all evil! It divides the hearts of fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters; it drags down the body to the grave and sinks the soul in perdition. O, Harry, the soul of your father cannot slumber till peace and harmony be restored to his family. Let my will be executed as it is written; let all quarrellings and bickerings cease, otherwise my angry spirits shall harass and torment all who refuse to obey my commands. With these words, an impressive shake of the head, and a defiant gesture, the spectre touched the reins of his horse, and was soon lost from view in the shadows of night.

Harry sat as if petrified, gazing into the midnight darkness long after the vision had disappeared. His dress, his silvery locks, every look and gesture wore so exactly like his father's! He remembered the concluding clause of the will, could it be that it was indeed genuine and legal, and that the distressed spirit of his parent was indeed wandering in this terrestrial sphere, to haunt and harass, as it had threatened, all who refused to obey the mandate of his will?

It was a late hour that night when Harry Scneider arrived within sight of the old homestead, his paternal mansion. A full bright light glared from the sitting-room. What did it mean? Had anything unusual occurred? The family of Scnders were notorious for keeping early hours. "To go to bed with the chickens" had been old Jacob's motto. Since his death, however, the hour for retiring had been changed, but now nine was the latest hour a lamp was allowed to burn.

Anxious and curious to ascertain the cause of so uncommon a deviation from the established custom, Harry slightly shook the reins of his horse, and cantered briskly up the yard. Hastily dismounting, he attempted to open the door, but it was locked. He then knocked, and called loudly for admission, but all was still and silent as if the whole household were wrapped in profound slumber. At last a window was opened cautiously, and noiselessly over his head, and the pale, terrified face of Mrs. Scneider appeared.

"O, Harry," she faltered out, in low, tremulous tones, as her eyes fell upon her son, "I am so rejoiced to see you! We have been so frightened—I do believe the house is haunted. We've heard rappings, whisperings, the stamping and tramping of feet—"

"It's the spirits, they are up out of their graves, wandering up and down the earth, visiting the wicked and the ungodly, and warning them to be ready for the great and notable day of the Lord," interposed old Grandmother Reed, who had been a member of the family for some time past.

"Did you see any one?" asked Harry.

"Yes," said his mother, in a somewhat calmer tone. "I was sitting by the window, darning stockings, when suddenly I heard a tramping and rapping overhead, and a voice called, 'Look out of the window, Mary Scneider!' and, Harry, as sure as I am a living, breathing woman, there stood the figure of my buried husband, dressed in his common gray coat and blue pants, with his broad-rimmed hat on, and his white hair hanging down beneath it; and he looked pale and sad, and mournful, and leaned heavily on his brass-headed cane for support. It was no phantom of the imagination, Harry. If my eyes are old they did not deceive me."

"What did he say?" inquired Harry, eagerly, for the thought crossed his mind that his mother's ghostly visitor and his own travelling companion of the evening were one and the same.

"Mary," said he, in low, solemn tones, "my soul is disturbed; my property is sowing the seeds of discord and dissension in my family, and I have assumed once more bodily shape, to visit my earthly habitation, and entreat my sons to execute my will in the manner it is written. I speak from the spirit world. If peace and good will prevail, I shall go back to my last resting place and slumber undisturbed till the day of the resurrection, otherwise I will torment and harass them as long as the breath of life remains."

"There," exclaimed Harry, as his mother concluded, "this is the first clue I have been able to obtain to the mystery connected with that will. I am convinced by this circumstance that a number are deeply intriguing against us; but I'll sift the matter to its very foundations. I'll ferret out the scamps who have had recourse to ghostly visitations to accomplish their ends, and they shall not go unwhipped by justice."

"Where are you going?" asked his mother, as Harry took the lamp and was leaving the room at hasty strides.

"Up stairs, up to the old oak chest, to see if the clothes are gone."

It was as he had surmised: the chest had been visited and ransacked, every article of wearing apparel belonging to old Jacob was gone, coat, hat, cane, shoes and pants, all had been taken, and the chest was entirely empty.

That night sleep refused to visit the eyelids of Harry Scneider; they remained as wide open as if they had been fastened. His mind was filled with all sorts of surmises and conjectures. The events of the evening, so far from intimidating him into submission to the loss of his lawful rights, made him the more determined to vindicate them, and to carry the will into court. He remembered perfectly well that in his last interview with Dixon before going to Harrisburg, he had threatened him pretty strongly, and saw at a glance that the wily lawyer was exceedingly averse to having a legal investigation made of the matter.

"Would it not be better," said Dixon, in his usual bland, silvery voice, "for your brother to buy you out? To settle upon you a certain sum for the relinquishment of your claims? A lawsuit would be an expensive affair. It would unquestionably go against you, and the cost of the suit would be thrown upon you to pay."

This conversation he recalled to mind, and that Dixon and the ghost were acting in concert, there could be no doubt, and that their object was to terrify him into submission.

To defeat this object, and unravel the mystery concerning the will, all the energies of his mind were bent. Ah, Lawyer Dixon little knew, with all his art and cunning, that in arousing the slumbering fire of Harry Scneider, he had a powerful foe to cope with, fully, if not more than, his equal. A scheme was devised—to produce the re-appearance of the ghost was a part of it—the rest will be unfolded to our readers.

In pursuance with the course of action he had marked out for himself, another visit was paid to Dixon. He protested more strongly than ever his determination to adhere to his purpose of resorting to the law to establish his rights, declared that the will should be proved a forgery, and the perpetrators of the foul act be brought to justice. In vain Dixon expostulated and sought to dissuade him from his purpose. Harry was not to be moved. "We'll see," thought he, as he left the office, "if this interview has the desired effect of bringing around another ghostly visit."

Evening came, and found Harry seated at the window of the sitting-room overlooking the garden. The light had been purposely extinguished, to render him invisible to all outsiders, and a pair of loaded pistols were upon the table beside him. He was waiting for the re-appearance of his nocturnal visitor, and was determined to bring matters to a crisis. He had not long to wait. At precisely nine the garden gate creaked on its hinges and opened slowly, and a figure slightly bent forward, clothed in the usual garb of a gray coat and blue pants, advanced, and stationed itself within a few yards from him.

"The spirit of Jacob Scnider," began the spectre, in the same hollow tones, "is grieved at the jarings and disputes—"

"Stop," cried Harry, "we have had enough of this lingo. If you are indeed the spirit of my buried father, a bullet will do you no harm; if you are a living being, come here to delude and impose upon us, it will settle our accounts."

With these words he discharged one of his pistols. The ball whistled harmlessly over the head of the apparition as he had intended, but the pretended ghost quite forgetful of the character in which he was acting, with a terrific shriek took to his heels and sprang upon the garden wall, which he attempted to clear at a bound, but unfortunately the stones were loose, his footing gave way, and he fell back to the ground, bringing down upon him a large, heavy stone in his fall. At this sight Harry rushed out, and with one stroke of his strong arm removed the stone from the crushed and bleeding limb, and seizing its owner by the collar, dragged him without ceremony into the house, and presented him to the astonished group. Pulling off the broad-rimmed hat from the head, and the white wig under it, the features of Dick Howe were revealed.

"Villain!" exclaimed Harry, with one finger upon the trigger of the loaded pistol pointed directly to his breast, "confess instantly what you are here for, and who your accomplices are, or your life shall pay the forfeit!"

"Mercy, mercy, in the name of Heaven!" shrieked out the poor, terrified wretch, as he staggered to release himself from Harry's iron grasp. "Spare me, I entreat you, and I'll reveal all."

"Then tell the truth and nothing but the truth, or I'll shoot you as you deserve," replied Harry, without moving a hair's breadth the muzzle of his pistol.

And Dick Howe, in low, faltering tones revealed, without any attempt at concealment, the whole story of the will, from beginning to end. That Thomas Scnider, to appropriate to himself the whole of his father's property, and by a promise of a five thousand dollar reward, in case he succeeded, had induced Dixon to join him; that the will had been written by him, and he had penetrated into the dead man's chamber, and in presence of Thomas and the two clerks for witnesses, had affixed, by holding the dead hand within his own, his signature to it. He said that he himself had practised to some extent the art of ventriloquism, and was able to imitate almost any person's manner and gait, as well as their voice; that Dixon, fearing an exposure in case a legal investigation was made of the matter, had hired him to steal the clothes, and by means of a wig and paint, to personate old Jacob, and appear to the family in the way we have seen.

The next day all the sheriffs in the town were out scouring the country for the missing rogue; but all to no purpose—Dixon had wisely and prudently decamped. As for Thomas, his brother not only generously and humanely forgave him, but divided equally with him the inheritance of their father.

Years have passed, a great change has taken place in the old homestead. White paint and green blinds have added much to its appearance; a large, handsome piazza adorns its front, and bay windows its sides; a green-house has been erected, where the old shed stood, in which plants, rich and rare, many of them of foreign importations, bloom perpetually. The grounds, too, have been laid out with unequalled skill and taste. Fruit and ornamental trees, and an endless variety of creeping vines and shrubbery have been set out, and flowers of every hue and description blossom in its spacious gardens. The old wall has been removed where Dick Howe took his lackless leap, and a thick, heavy hedge has arisen in its stead. Earth can present no fairer, lovelier spot, no fireside more winsome, no home more happy, or hearts more loving and devoted, than its inmates, Harry Scnider and his charming family.

SEEK AND FIND.

Attempt the end, and never stand to doubt,
Nothing's so hard but search will find it out.

I'D TWINE A WREATH.

BY ALFRED WALKER.

I'd twine a wreath
Of flowers fair,
To deck this brow
So marked by care:
A wreath of flowers
From fame's bright vine,
And leaves of laurel
With them twine.

Their fragrance rich
Would cheer my heart,
And bid my grief
And care depart;
They fade not like
The flowers of love,
But live as bright
As stars above.

I seek not flowers
Of love below:
They fade and leave
Nought, nought but woe;
But fame will live,
Will live forever—
The laurel crown
Will fade—O, never!

LITTLE LILY.

A STORY FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

BY AUNT MARY.

ONE cold winter day, when the snow-flakes were falling like feathers from the sky, a good queen sat sewing at a window which had a framework of black ebony. And as she sewed, and looked through the black framework at the snow, she pricked her finger with the needle, and three drops of blood fell upon the white linen. Then thought the queen within herself—"O, that I had a child as white as snow, as red as blood, and as black as the ebony framework!"

Not long after, a little daughter was given to her that was as white as snow, as red as blood, and had hair as black as ebony, and therefore was called "Little Lily."

Soon after, the good queen died; and when a year had passed away, the king married another lady. She was a beautiful woman, but vain and tyrannical, and could not endure that there should be any one in the world that should be thought to be more beautiful than herself. Now she had a wonderful looking-glass, and when she went and looked at herself in it, and said:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is the fairest of all?"

the looking-glass answered:

"Lady queen, in the land thou art fairest of all."

Then was she content, for she knew that the looking-glass spoke the truth.

Now little Lily grew apace, and became every day more lovely, and when she was seven years old she was as beautiful as day, and more beautiful than the queen herself. So it was that when one day the queen asked her looking-glass again:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is fairest of all?"

it answered:

"Lady queen, thou art fair as fair may be,
But Lily's a thousand times fairer than thee!"

When the queen heard this, she became pale with jealousy and anger. From that hour forward, as often as she looked upon little Lily, her heart burned within with hatred towards the maiden. Her jealousy and pride increased daily, and at last became so great, that she could not rest even at night. Then she sent for a servant, and said to him:

"Take the child out with you into the forest; I cannot bear the sight of her. And when you get to the forest, kill her, and bring me back her lungs and liver as a token that you have done so."

The servant did as he was bid, and carried little Lily away to kill her. But when he had drawn his dagger, and was going to plunge it into the child's heart, she began to weep, and said:

"O, good man, spare my life! I will run about in the wild wood, and never come home again."

Little Lily was so young and so beautiful, that the servant had compassion on her, and said:

"Run away, then, my poor child. The wild beasts will soon have eaten thee up."

In his heart, however, he was right glad he had not killed the child; and as a young fawn just then came bounding past, he struck it down, took out its lungs and liver, and brought them to the queen. The cook was ordered to salt and dress them, and the wicked woman ate them up, and thought she had eaten little Lily's lungs and liver.

The poor child was now all alone in the forest, and in such distress, that she trembled all over. She looked and looked at the leaves upon the trees, and did not know how to help herself. At last she began to run over the sharp stones, and through the briars and thorns; but though the wild beasts passed her on her way, yet they did her no harm. She ran as long as her feet could carry her, and night was about to close in, when she saw a little house, and went in to rest herself. In the house everything was small—small, but pretty and neat, as nobody can tell. In it stood a little table spread with white, and seven little plates upon it, every plate with its spoon, and seven little knives and forks, and seven cups besides. Against the walls were seven little beds ranged all along, and seven little sheets on them, white as snow. Little Lily, being very hungry and thirsty, ate out of every plate a little crumb and bread, and drank out of every cup a drop of wine—for she did not wish to take the whole away from one only. After that, because she was so tired, she lay down on one of the little beds; but none of them fitted—one was too long, another was too short, but at last the seventh was just the size. She laid herself down in it, and after saying her prayers, fell fast asleep.

When it was quite dark, came the masters of the house, who were seven dwarfs who dug and dived for ore in the mountains. They lighted their seven little candles, and by the light they saw that somebody had been in the house—for nothing was standing in the same order that they had left it. The first said—"Who has been sitting in my chair?" The second—"Who has been eating off my plate?" The third—"Who has been taking a bite out of my cookie?" The fourth—"Who has been eating my crumb?" The fifth—"who has been using my fork?" The sixth—"Who has been cutting with my knife?" The seventh—"Who has been drinking out of my cup?" Then the first looked round and saw a little hollow in his bed, and said—"Who has been in my bed?" The others came running and cried—"Somebody has been lying in mine, too!" But the seventh, when he looked into his bed, beheld little Lily, who was lying there fast asleep. Then he called the others, who came running up and cried aloud for very wonder, and held up their seven little candles to look at little Lily. "O, goodness!" they exclaimed, "what a beautiful child!" And so great was their delight, that they could not think of waking her up, but let her sleep on in the little bed. And the seventh dwarf, hove about, slept with his companions, and so passed the night.

When it was morning, little Lily awoke, and when she saw the seven little men, she was greatly afraid. But they were kind and gentle to her, and asked—"What is your name?"

"My name is little Lily," she answered.

"How did you come into our house?" asked the little men once more.

Then the child told how her stepmother had tried to put her to death, but that the servant had spared her life, and after that, she had run the whole day, till at last she had come to their little cottage.

"If you will manage our house for us," said the dwarfs, "cook, make the beds, sew and stitch, and keep everything clean and tidy, you may stay with us, and you shall never want for anything."

Little Lily promised, and remained with them. She kept their house in the best order. Every morning they went to the mountains in search of ore; in the evening they came back, and their meal must be ready for them. All the day through the maiden was alone, but the good little dwarfs warned her, and said:

"Take care of your stepmother, who will soon learn that you are here. Therefore, let nobody in."

Now the queen, who thought she had eaten little Lily's lungs and liver, never dreamed but that she was the first and fairest lady in the world. So she stood before her glass, and said:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is fairest of all?"

But the glass answered:

"Lady queen, thou art fair as may be;
But little Lily who lives in the glen,
Over the hills, with the seven wee men,
Is a thousand times fairer still than thee."

Then she was afraid, for she knew that the glass never spoke untruth. She also saw that her servant had deceived her, for that little Lily was still alive. So she hated poor little Lily so much the more, and set about devising some fresh plan for her destruction; for as long as she was not, for certain, the fairest in the land, she could not rest. She colored her face, put on the dress of an old pedler-woman, and made herself so that no one could have known her.

In this disguise, she went across the seven mountains to the cottage of the seven dwarfs, knocked at their door, and cried:

"Fine wares to sell, cheap and good—fine wares to sell!"

Little Lily peeped out of the window, and said:

"Good day, my good woman! What have you got to sell?"

"Good wares, pretty wares," said she; "snoods of all colors, my pretty maid."

With that, she took out one that was made of parti colored silk.

"I may let the honest woman in," thought little Lily, and thereupon undid the bolt, and bought the pretty snood.

"Child," said the old woman, "how pretty you look! Come, I'll put it on very nicely for you."

Little Lily had no suspicion; so she stood up and let her fasten on the snood. But the old woman threw it hastily over her neck, and pulled—and pulled so hard, that at last little Lily lost her breath and sank down as if she were dead.

"Take that, for being the fairest!" said the old lady, as she hurried away.

Not long after, at eventide, the seven dwarfs came home, and great was their dismay to find their dear little Lily lying on the ground as if she was dead. They lifted her up and cut the snood asunder, upon which she began once more to breathe, and by little and little came back to life. When the dwarfs heard what had happened, they said:

"The old pedler-woman was certainly the queen—take care not to let anybody in when we are not with thee!"

Now the wicked woman, when she got home, went to her glass and asked:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is fairest of all?"

Then the glass answered:

"Lady queen, thou art fair as may be;
But little Lily who lives in the glen,
Over the hills, with the seven wee men,
Is a thousand times fairer still than thee."

When the wicked queen heard this, all the blood ran to her heart, she was so dismayed; for she knew well that little Lily was alive again.

"But now," she said, "I will fall upon a plan to destroy her without fail." And with the witch's arts, she made a poisoned comb.

Then she dressed herself in the disguise of an old woman, and away she went over the seven mountains to the house of the seven dwarfs, knocked at their door, and cried:

"Fine wares to sell—cheap and good!"

Little Lily looked out, and said:

"Pass on your way, good woman; I dare not let anybody in."

"Nobody can blame you for looking, at least," said the old woman, as she drew out the poisoned comb and held it up.

The simple child was so taken with it, that she let herself be befooled, and opened the door. When she had looked at the comb and fingered it every way, the old woman said:

"Now I will put in the comb nicely for you!"

Poor, innocent little Lily gave the old woman leave; but scarcely had it been fixed in her hair, when the poison began to work, and she fell senseless on the ground.

"Thou paragon of beauty, now is thy fate sealed!" said the wicked woman, and went away.

By good luck, it was not far from evening when the seven dwarfs came home. When they beheld little Lily lying on the ground as if she was dead, they at once suspected her wicked step-mother. They therefore made a search, and found the poisoned comb; and when they had drawn it out, little Lily came to herself again, and told them what had passed. Then they entreated her once more to be on her guard, and not to open the door to any one.

As soon as she got home, the queen stationed herself before the glass, and said:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is fairest of all?"

Then it answered as before.

When she heard the glass speak this way, she trembled and shook with rage.

"Lily shall die," she exclaimed, "though it costs me my own life!"

With this, she went into a secret chamber and there made an apple that looked beautiful on the outside—white it was, with rosy cheeks—so that whoever gazed on it, longed for it; but inside one half of it was so poisoned, that whoever took the smallest piece into his mouth, was sure to die.

When the apple was ready, she painted her face, disguised herself as a peasant woman, and so away she went to the cottage of the seven dwarfs. She knocked, and little Lily looked out of the window and said:

"I dare not let anybody in; the seven dwarfs have forbidden me."

"Very well," answered the peasant woman; "I only want to get quit of my apples. There is one as a present for you."

"No," said little Lily, "I dare not take anything."

"O, I suppose you think it poisonous!" said the old woman. "Look you! I will cut the apple in two. Do you eat the red cheek, and I will eat the white." And as she said this, she held out the poisoned half of the apple.

Little Lily felt a great longing for the beautiful apple; and when she saw the peasant woman eat a piece of it, she could resist no longer, but took the poisoned half. Scarcely had she taken a bite of it, when she fell down dead. The queen laughed, and said, triumphantly:

"White as snow—red as blood—black as ebony! this time the dwarfs cannot waken you again."

And when she inquired as before of the glass at home, it answered at last:

"Lady queen, in the land thou art fairest of all."

Then she was satisfied.

The seven little men came home at night, as usual, and found their dear little Lily lying dead on the ground. Their grief was excessive. They placed her on a bier, and they all seven sat around it, mourning for three whole days. After that, they would have buried her, but that she still looked fresh as a living creature, and still retained her beautiful red cheeks.

"We cannot bury this still lovely creature in the black earth," they said. And so, by their art, they made a transparent coffin of glass, where you might see in from every side.

In this coffin they laid little Lily, and upon it wrote her name in golden letters, and that she was a king's daughter. Then they set the coffin out upon a mountain, and one of them always sat beside it and kept watch. And the birds came, too, and mourned for little Lily—first an owl, then a raven, and last of all, a dove. Little Lily lay a long time in the coffin, and did not change, but looked as though she were asleep—for she was still as white as snow, as red as blood, and hair as black as ebony.

Now it fell out that a king's son went to hunt in the forest, and came to the house of the seven dwarfs to pass the night there. He saw the coffin upon the mountain, and the beautiful child inside. Then he said to the seven little men:

"Let me have the coffin; I will give you whatever you desire for it."

But the little men answered:

"We would not part with it for all the gold in the world."

Then he said: "Do give it me, for I cannot live without seeing little Lily—I will honor and esteem it as the thing nearest to my heart."

Hearing him speak thus, the good dwarfs took compassion on him and gave him the coffin, and the king's son ordered his attendants to bear it away on their shoulders. It so happened that they stumbled over a bush; and with the shock, the piece of the poisoned apple which little Lily had bitten fell out of her mouth, and she came to life again. Then she raised herself up and said—"Kind heavens! where am I?"

"Thou art with me!" cried the king's son, full of joy; and he told her what had happened. "Come with me to my father's castle, and thou shalt be my bride."

Little Lily consented, and their marriage was celebrated with great solemnity and splendor.

Now little Lily's step-mother was invited along with the rest to the feast, and when she had decked herself in her finest attire, she said to her glass:

"Glass, glass, that hangs on the wall,
Who in the land is fairest of all?"

Then the glass answered:

"Lady queen, thou art fair as fair may be,
But the young queen's a thousand times fairer than thee."

At this, her rage was terrible. When she entered the castle and saw little Lily, she stood stock still with terror and dismay. Meanwhile a pair of iron slippers, heated in a fierce fire, were brought in; and in these fiery red shoes, the queen was made to dance. Nor was she permitted to stop, until she had danced herself to death.

BRAZILIAN DIAMONDS.

It is the opinion of those persons best acquainted with the district, that when the diamond mine at Chapada was first discovered, in 1845, there were found 4000 to 5000 carats of diamonds a month, and several persons agree at estimating the quantity during the year 1846 at 10,000 to 12,000 carats per month. The produce then began to diminish considerably, and last year much fewer were found. It is difficult to say whether this diminution absolutely occurred through a failure in the production, or whether the great losses that numbers of the speculators encountered occasioned many people to abandon the search after these precious gems, the value of diamonds having fallen considerably in the European market.—Brazil: Stray Notes from Bahia.

MAPLE SUGAR.

The Aroostook Herald says, Madawaska is the great sugar producing district of Maine. The French people there make a business of making maple sugar during the sugar season, and it is brought here for sale in large quantities. Last Tuesday our neighbor Hines, over the way, bought thirty-five hundred pounds of this native production. One man bought twenty-four hundred pounds. These people mould it into queer and fantastic shapes. We saw one cake moulded into the form of a house, while some of the ornaments are artistic in the extreme. The manufacture of this article is rapidly increasing every year.

AN ALLEGORY.

A humming-bird met a butterfly, and being pleased with the beauty of its person, and the glory of its wings, made an offer of perpetual friendship. "I cannot think of it," was the reply, "as you once spurned me, and called me a crawling dolt!" "Impossible!" exclaimed the humming-bird. "I always entertained the highest respect for such beautiful creatures as you." "Perhaps you do now," said the other, "but when you insulted me I was a caterpillar. So let me give you a bit of advice. Never insult the humble, as they may become your superiors."

FLOWERS.

With fairest flowers,
While summer lasts, and I live here, Fidele,
I'll sweeten thy sad grave. Thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose; nor
The saured harebell, like thy veins: no, nor
The leaf of aglantine, whom not to slander,
Out-sweetened not thy breath;
Yea, and furred moss besides, when flowers are none,
To winter-ground thy corpse.—SHAKESPEARE.

LA REVERIE.

BY LINNIE.

The firelight danceth o'er the wall
With playful, changing gleam;
And bygone years come floating back,
A half-forgotten dream.

Dim, shadowy forms go flitting by
In noiseless, rapid flight;
While through the past and memory sheds
Her mellow, chastened light.

Amid the gloom dark starry eyes
The light of love impart;
Again thrills back the music
To my crushed and broken heart.

Within my soul there rings a voice,
A rich and melting tone:
A lingering echo, that awoke
To these fond words "mine own!"

Again a flushed and happy face,
Lit with love's magic glow,
Is bending o'er me, bringing back
The joyous "long ago."

Embracing arms with warm caress
Are gently round me thrown;
I wake once more to life and hope—
I am not now alone!

But hush, O heart! a spectre dark
Goes hurrying by thee now:
O God, 'tis Death!—his shadow falls
Upon that noble brow.

It paleth, fading suddenly;
Before that icy chill
The soul's rich melody grows faint,
The warm heart's throbbings still.

The tolling bell rings out a knell
That echoes in my brain;
Before me glide with muffled sound
A mournful, funeral train.

The lonely hours, the wild despair,
The deep but "stifled moan,"
Come back and whisper mockingly,
For aye thou art alone.

Alone! I have a God, and know
My prayers are not in vain;
For in yon heaven with joy 'tis given
To join love's broken chain.

But now oblivion's veil sweeps down,
In darkling folds o'er all;
The dim past fades amid its shades,
As the firelight on the wall.

And as the last ray flickering dies,
My visions all depart;
And naught disturbs the silence,
Save the beating of my heart.

UNCLE JOE'S OLD CLOAK.

BY LUCY F. WINSLOW.

"WHY, Jemima, how tired you do look!"

"Well, marm, it's enough to tire a body to death to work a week at Miss Brown's with that onruly pack of young ones."

"Don't it beat all natur that a woman will bring up a family so?"

"I never see sich actions in all my born days. While I was there they got a fightin', and Thomas Jefferson knocked Napoleon Bonaparte agin the corner of that old-fashioned chist of drawers her grandmother left her, and raised an awful black and blue spot on his forehead; if it had hit him on the temple, he'd never known what hurt him. Then Fisher Ames pinched Baron Steuben's ear with the fire-tongs, and if he didn't holler I'll miss my guess. Well, one artemoon Miss Brown went and changed her gownd, for a wonder (I should think Mr. Brown would git tired of seein' that dirty gownd every day of his life), and she washed Amanda Melvina Fitzallan's face and hands and put on a clean tire. Amanda Melvina come in and sot down as still as could be (that child would be sumthin' if she only had anybody to show her how), and Miss Brown had got a talkin', and I jest begun to take a little comfort, when Thaddeus Constantine Sobieski come tearin' in, and wanted Amanda Melvina Fitzallan to come and help him make mud pies. She told him she didn't want to, 'cause she had a clean tire on. 'You needn't be so stuck up,' says he, 'and think you're a lady, 'cause you haint.' And he grabbed a double handful of ashes (Miss Brown always has a peck in each corner) and throwed 'em all over her tire and gownd! If my fingers didn't itch to git hold of that youngster!"

"Well, I allays said so, and I say so still—folks needn't have sich actin' young ones. When mine did anything I told 'em not to, I jest laid the birch about their legs till they danced Menuno, I tell ye! But law! Miss Brown haint got no force; she means well, but what is the use of meanin' well, if you don't do somethin'?"

"That is jest my mind. For my part, I had rather see a woman like brother Simon's wife, bring something to pass, if she does scold, than one of your easy, shiftless sort, that are allays good-natured 'cause they haint got life enough to git mad."

Jemima Hill was one of those spinsters not infrequent in New England, who without any great fault, and with an abundance of good qualities, had failed of awakening the grand passion in the hearts of the stronger sex. In a word, Jemima was not magnetic. No smarter hand at a quilting-bee, or an apple-paring, no better dairy-woman could be found in all the country round, than Deacon Hill's darter Jemima. Neat as wax-work their roomy, unpainted kitchen was with frequent scourings. Neither was Jemima a scold (though she sometimes spoke with energy, just as you and I do, dear reader, when we are provoked), and unlike the frequently-drawn type of that much-maligned class designated "old maids," she was no busybody. As she went from house to house in the capacity of tailoress, when asked if she knew aught of the truth of certain reports, her curt reply was, "She had as much as she could do to 'tend to her own business, without meddling with other folkses." But when sickness or death came among her acquaintance, her services were promptly tendered and gratefully accepted. Her mother, "Aunt Dorkies," had been a famous "doctress woman," and when infirmity rendered it difficult for her to leave her home, her mantle fell on "Darter Jemima."

But tailoring was her forte. In this field, her genius shone pre-eminent. What a ripping and piecing and turning and sponging followed her advent in any family. Old garments saw the light of day which had hung in dark presses for many a year, from the many-caped cloak for men, to the cloth habit mother spun and wove for herself, and which had been "taken for broadcloth." Men past their prime, who were subsiding into grave, elderly citizens, arrayed themselves in garments whose style could date back twenty years. It showed them to be men of steadfast mind, above the fopperies and fooleries of the present day; for then, as now, old people mourned over the degeneracy of the age, and sighed for a return of the good old times. Let us look back one hundred years, and see if simplicity was the order of the day.

I find by referring to the journal of the first pastor of Portland, Maine, a description of the dress of one of the beaux who went a courting in 1750. He wore a full-bottomed wig and cocked hat, scarlet coat and small clothes, white waistcoat and stockings, shoes with silver buckles, and two watches, one on each side!

Saying that young folks didn't like to dress like old folks, and for her part she thought it was best for every one to have their clothes cut as they wanted them, she unrolled, to the great gratification of the Beau Brummels of the region, a pattern of the pantaloons worn by brother Simon's wife's brother, who tended store in Portland. With such high authority, the youthful swain went to see his sweetheart on the next Sunday evening, with the gratifying consciousness that "his close sot as well as Jim Miller's, and his was cut by the Saco tailor, and a nation sight easier."

Though Jemima never professed to love children, she was exceedingly popular with little boys. All the little boys on her circuit rejoiced in the possession of two pockets, one on each side just like father's, and she insisted on a liberal allowance of bright buttons, which were disposed in shining rows on the jacket, to the unbounded admiration of the wearer. Jemima seldom spoke of herself, but one of her exploits she narrated occasionally to her intimate friends.

"One fall, when I went to Miss Giles to work, I knowed I should have to git along most anyhow. Their rye had rusted, and Mr. Giles reckoned considerable on his rye, and he was taken sick in haying time, and to crown all, one of their best cows died the fust of the fall, so I was purty sure they'd have a hard time to make both ends meet, 'specially as Mr. Giles hadn't got his farm paid for. I allays liked Miss Giles. She's a real good woman, tries to help her husband along all she can, and bring up her children to behave themselves, so I made up my mind to be as scrimpin' of my trimmin's, and git along jest as cheap as I could.

"I thought if Miss Giles offered to pay me when I come away, I'd jest tell her that I'd no occasion for the money, and would ruther 'twould be in Mr. Giles's hands for a year to come than not. You see it would not have done to offered to give it to her, she'd taken an affront. My bill wasn't no great, 'tis true, but in a family every cent counts.

"Arter I'd altered Mr. Giles's old coat into a monkey jacket (for it was so worn out it couldn't be made over any other way) and making him a waistcoat out of new cloth, Miss Giles says to me, 'I expect you'll be purty much discouraged when I show you what I've got to make the boys' close out of.' And sure enough, I was discouraged when she brought along that old blue broadcloth cloak with three capes, that her Uncle Joe used to wear afore he went to Massachusetts to live with son Moses. Miss Giles said:

"Arter Aunt Sebee died, Moses wanted his father to come and live with him, but Uncle Joe stayed with us, 'cause he hated to leave the place. At last Moses come down from Massachusetts for him. You see Moses was a shoemaker in Lynn, and as he'd got to be a little forehanded he felt kinder sot up, and so he says, 'Father,' says he, 'you must fix up a little, you must not wear that old cloak to Lynn, you know.'

" 'Moses,' said the old man, 'I've taken a great deal of comfort in that old cloak, more'n ever I shall take on this airth agin.' And he fetched a deep sigh.

" 'O, father,' says Moses, 'when we get you up to Lynn, we'll cheer you up. There's lots of things for you to see, and that'll take up your attention, and then you'll feel better than you do here.'

Uncle Joe said nothing, but I knowed he'd hanker arter the old place, it's nateral for old folks. So when Moses went to Portland the next day, he bought his father a new hat and the cloth for a new greatcoat. He tried to get his father to have a stylish pair of boots, but Uncle Joe says:

" 'Moses, I've worn this kind of boots ever sence I left off wearin' buskins, and I can't change my boots for nobody. 'Taint a great while I shall want any.'

" 'Moses didn't say nothin' more, 'cause that made him feel kinder bad, but off he starts down to your house, to git you to come and make the coat, 'cause he knowed you could suit his father better'n anybody.

" 'The mornin' Uncle Joe and Moses started for Lynn, Sarah Ann says, 'Uncle Joe,' says she, 'how smart you look! What a nice greatcoat you've got.'

" 'Yes, child, yes,' says Uncle Joe, says he, ' 'tis a good coat—a nice coat, and I'm much obliged to Moses for it, but 'taint the old feelin', child, 'taint the old feelin'.'

" 'Poor Uncle Joe! I pitied him, 'cause I knowed he was thinkin' how he used to wear that old cloak when Aunt Sebee was 'live, and how many times she'd helped him on and off with it.'

" 'Well, Miss Giles wanted me to make a jacket and trowsers for Zeky and Sammy out of that old cloak of Uncle Joe's. 'Twould have been an easy matter enough for boys a good deal bigger than they was, if the cloak was good for anything; but, law me, seems though nigh 'pon half of it was worn threadbare, and there was spots on some parts; so, take it long and large, it did look despart.

" 'Thinks I to myself, 'Now, Jemima Hill, you've got agin a stump, if you never did afore.' I was jest agoin' to say I'd give up beat this time, when I happened to look at Zeky and Sammy, who stood right at my elbow, looking up into my face as though life and death depended upon my answer, and I couldn't find it in my heart to say 'it can't be done,' for I knowed they'd be dreadful disappointed. Thinks I to myself, 'Jemima Hill, you've got jackets and trowsers out of 'mazin' small patterns in your day, and if you ever sot your wits to work, you'd better do it now.' So, says I to their mother:

" 'Miss Giles,' says I, 'it'll be a hard rub, but I shan't give it up, till I've brushed and sponged and pressed it all out.'

" 'I should have had it all ripped apart,' says Miss Giles, 'but I didn't know as you could do anything with it, and it's handy now, just as it is, to wrap round the children mornin's, when they ride to school on the ox-sled.'

" 'So Miss Giles and Sarah Ann clapped right down, and ripped it apart in less than no time. Then, arter I'd brushed it well, I went to work to take out the spots. I had a bottle of stuff July Mills sent me from Boston, that was the capsheafe of anything I ever see for takin' out spots. July Mills and her father and mother live in Boston now, but they used to live in Portland. The father was a ship-builder, and many and many's the load of ship-timber my father's hauled him years ago. Well, Mr. Mills allays sot a great store by father, and father sot a great store by Mr. Mills. Well, arter they'd lived in Boston awhile, July got kinder run down, and the doctor told her the best thing she could do, was to go back into the country and breathe the mountain air. So Mr. Mills he writ to father to know if we'd board July a couple of months. When father got the letter he told me to set right down and write back that his daughter could come and welcome. As for board, he shouldn't take a cent, for he'd considered him in a good many trades, and if he should board his darter all summer, he wouldn't be beholden to him.

" 'When July come, her father fetched her down to Portland in his hoss and shay. Folks that's travellin' ginerally go from Boston to Portland in three days, but July was kinder aillin' and her father was dreadful tender of her, and so they was four days comin' down. They stayed at Mr. Mills's wife's sister's while Mr. Mills was seein' to his business, and then he put her on board the Limminton stage, and charged the driver when he got over to Limminton Corner to speak to the landlord of the tavern to carry her over to Deacon Hill's. Her father warn't none consarned but what she'd git over there fast enough if they only knowed where she wanted to go, for he knowed the people all over town would do nigh upon anything to oblige father, 'cause he was one of the old standards and was out in the Revolution. Sure enough, the landlord took his own hoss and wagon, and brought her over himself; and he was 'mazin' taken with her, 'cause she told him all about Bunker Hill and Dorchester Heights, and she'd been out with her father to Lexington, and stood on the very ground where the Revolution begun. The landlord had never been to Boston, but father had seen them places, for besides bein' out in the Revolution, he'd been Representative to General Court when we were under Massachusetts.

"I've seen father laugh and shake his sides many a time about the story old Mr. Winckly told when father come home from General Court one time. Father's been deacon a good many years, but he never could help laughing 'bout that story. One time when father come home from General Court, he was tellin' down in Mr. Mosely's store, that while he was in Boston a theatre was burnt, and he saw a man that saw the ashes. Father and all the old folks call it theatre, but the young folks now-a-days call it theatre. Well, old Mr. Winckly heard father tellin' that while he was in Boston the theatre was burnt, and he saw a man that saw the ashes, and off he starts to tell the news. He never more than half understood what you told him. He hadn't got fairly away from the store, when he met two men in a horse and wagon. He couldn't wait till he got to a house to tell the news, so he hailed them :

" 'Did ye hear the news ?'

" 'No—what is it ?'

" 'Hill says that while he was in Boston the Creator was burnt, and he saw the ashes !'

"Well, they was curis kind of folks them Wincklys, all of 'em. They had no faculty, the town allays had to help 'em through the winter. But arter old 'Lijah and Zachariah and Jeddiah and Paul Winckly experienced religion, 'twas surprisin' what a gift they had in prayer. Why, old 'Lijah Winckly could pray equal to old Parson Miltimore, down in Scarboro, and he was a powerful man in prayer, and college larnt, too. It did beat all natur, what a gift they had for prayin' and singin', and no sense for anything else.

"Well, July stayed till the first week in September, and she did pick up her crumbs 'mazin'ly. She drinked new milk, and stayed out of doors most of the time when the weather was fair. When she went home, she went from Portland to Boston in the stage, and when the stage stopped at her father's door, he hardly knowed her she'd fattened up so, and her cheeks were jest as red as pineys.

"Well, about Thanksgiving time down come a box from Boston, and there was a dress in it for marm and me, and a waistcoat pattern for father, and some thread and silk and buttons for boys' jackets, and this little bottle I'm tellin' on.

July writ a letter and put it in the box. She said she'd heard me tell that sometimes I felt worried nigh about to death, for fear the pesky young ones wuld git my work all greased up afore I could git it done. And that's how I come to have this bottle. But land of the living, I shall never get through tellin' you about them jackets and trowsers of Miss Giles's. Well, I must say, that I don't believe there is a woman in the State of Maine ever furbished up a piece of cloth as I did that. Why, it looked nigh upon as well as new. One thing was, it was real, jinooine broadcloth in the day of it, and real broadcloth will wear like iron and hold the color 'mazin'ly. Well, arter I'd got the pieces all pressed out to my mind, I lays 'em up on the back of that great easy-chair that's covered with that great flowering chintz that was her grandmother's gownd when she was a gal, and then I calls Miss Giles and Sarah Ann and the boys in to look at it. When Miss Giles laid her eyes on it, she lifts up her hands and says :

" 'You don't mean to say that's the cloth of Uncle Joe's old cloak ?'

" 'Yes, Miss Giles,' said I, 'I mean to say that very thing.'

" 'Well,' says she, 'Praise to the face is open disgrace,' but I don't believe there's another woman in Maine or Massachusetts that could have made that cloth shine so.'

" 'O, marm,' says Zeky, 'that looks as purty as cousin Eddy's jacket.' Cousin Eddy is Mr. Giles's brother's Robert's son.

"Robert keeps store over to Limminton Corner, and as he's a good lookout, he's got to be purty forehanded. His wife's a dressy sort of a body, but a better-hearted woman never walked this airth. Two or three weeks before Thanksgiving she says to her husband :

" 'Robert,' says she, 'I've been thinkin' about our boys havin' a party, and invitin' all the boys and gals at Limminton Corner, and I thought I'd send over and ask your brother James's boys to come over to Thanksgiving and spend a week. I thought if you was willin', our hired man could take our sleigh with two seats right away after breakfast, Thanksgiving mornin', and go over to James with our boys, and bring Zeky and Sammy over to dinner. I know the boys will enjoy the ride, specially James's, as he don't keep a horse, they don't git a ride very often.'

"Robert didn't say nothin' for a minute or two, and she looked up in his face and says, 'I thought you would be pleased with my plan, Robert.'

" 'I am ; but I was thinking there wasn't many women that took so much pains to keep their house lookin' nice as you do, that would be willin' to ask two little boys to come and stay a week, when they had three boys of their own. But,' says he, (and his voice trembled a little) 'your heart was always as kind, as your face was pretty.'

"Robert Giles is proud of his wife, and well he may be, for she is jest as purty as a pink. Afore she was married, she was the handsomest gal that went into Limminton meetin'-us. Debby Grant was there makin' her a gownd, and she heard the whole of it and told me. She thinks the hull world of Robert Giles's wife.

"But sakes alive! I haint come to the upshot of them jackets and trowsers yet. I do declare I shall begin to think I am as bad as old Granny Barker. She'll begin to tell a story, and then she'll branch off upon another, and then another, and afore she gits through she'll tell half a dozen different stories, but she never finishes up the fust one. Now this time I'm determined to go right straight through. Says Miss Giles to me:

"Can you git 'em out?"

"Miss Giles,' says I, 'I guess I can.'

"You'd orter seen how tickled them boys was. Zeky hurrawed as loud as he could, and Sammy down on the floor and rolled over and over and kicked up his heels, then they scampered out of doors like crazy creatures, and pitched head foremost into a snowdrift and turned end over end half a dozen times. Well, at it I went, and if I didn't make every inch of that cloth count, I'll miss my guess. All that I cut to waste you might have put in the corner of your eye. And then I piecened and piecened, and arter I'd pressed 'em, you couldn't have told there was a seam there, unless you held the garment right up close to your eyes. When I got 'em purty nigh done, Miss Giles told the boys when she was puttin' 'em to bed, that afore they went to bed agin their new clothes would be done, and they went up stairs singin', 'Our new jackets and trowsers will be done to-morrow,' jest as happy as clams. Arter she'd come down, I says to Miss Giles:

"The room is warm and still, and I'll jest set up till I finish the clothes. I want to go home and bake for marm and scour up the floor afore I go over to Captain Harris's, and I expect 'em arter me day arter to-morrow mornin'.' So long in the evenin' I says to Miss Giles, 'what kind of buttons have you got to trim them jackets with?' Well, she showed me what she had, and though they'd do, if a body couldn't do no better, they wa'n't what I wanted. So, says I to Miss Giles, 'Father is gittin' old, and I feel worried about his goin' to mill this winter, it's so fur and cold. Now, if Mr. Giles will call and take his grist on his ox-sled when he goes to mill, I'll take some buttons July Mills sent me from Boston, and put a double row in front, and one row over the shoulder and down on each side of the back, and that'll put on the finishing touch, I guess.'

"Well,' says Miss Giles, 'you know my husband would be glad to obleege your father, but I know your father's kinder independent feelin', and likes to pay for any little job, so I'll take up with your offer, and thank ye kindly.'

"Well, when I got them jackets trimmed, I must say them buttons took the shine off of anything I ever seed afore. They was shaped like little balls, holler inside, and all finifed off on the outside. The clock struck twelve afore I laid my head on my pillow that night, but I didn't vally my pains a bit. Arter I made my bed the next mornin', I laid them jackets and trowsers on the side of the bed, so they'd show to the best advantage. When breakfast was over, says I to Miss Giles, 'I want you to step into the forerom a minute.'

Well, Sarah Ann followed her, and Mr. Giles, he knowed what was in the wind, he come too. When they'd fairly got out of the room, I says to the little boys, 'You can come into the forerom, if you want to.' When we got in, Mr. Giles stood before the fire with his hands behind him, and Miss-Giles and Sarah Ann stood right in front of the bed makin' believe talk. The boys looked all round, and then Miss Giles and Sarah Ann stepped a one side, and 'twant a second afore Zeky spied 'em out, and if he didn't run to the side of the bed, singin' out, 'Look, Sammy, only look here!'

"Just like a trainer's!' says Sammy—'just like a trainer's! Hurraw! hurraw!' And he hopped right up and down.

"Then they looked at them jackets, and looked at 'em, and turned 'em over and put their hands in their pockets, and I didn't know as they'd ever be willin' to take their eyes off of 'em. I don't know but Miss Giles and Mr. Giles and Sarah Ann was most as much pleased as the boys. Mr. Giles is a still sort of man, never says much, but when he went out of the room, he says, 'I wouldn't have believed mortal woman could have got two such handsome suits out of that old cloak of Uncle Joe's.'"

LIFE.

See how, beneath the moonbeam's smile,
Yon little billow heaves its breast,
And foams and sparkles for awhile,
And, murmuring, then subsides to rest.
Thus man, the sport of bliss and care,
Rises on time's eventful sea;
And having swelled a moment there,
Thus melts into eternity.—AXON.

TO A LOVED ONE.

BY WILLIAM WAIT.

The silvery moon's fast wending
Toward her western home,
And the gem-eyed stars of even Fill the pure azure dome;
The echo of the midnight bell
I now distinctly hear;
All, all is calm and still around—
My heart is sad and drear.

I'm sitting all alone to-night,
My thoughts are of thee, love:
For thee I weep and pray to-night,
Pray to heaven above;
I feel as if it would be bliss,
Beneath this midnight sky,
To lay my weary, aching head
Upon thy breast and die.

For all the world is dark to me,
And all its pleasures vain,
Unless they all are shared with thee,
Life's pleasures, cares and pains.
O, couldst thou read my heart aright,
While bending at thy shrine,
Thou wouldst no longer doubt my love,
Nor fear to call me thine!

JESSIE COLEMAN'S PLAIN DINNER.

BY KATE WARD.

"HAVE you heard the news? Tom Coleman was married last week to some pretty little girl in the country, rich in love, it is to be hoped, as she is rich in nothing else!" And the speaker, a fashionable young man, curled his mustache with a compassionate smile.

"How ridiculous in Tom! Why, with his expectations, and being the general favorite that he is, he might have married an heiress any day!" was the rejoinder, between the puffs of a cigar.

"His expectations don't amount to anything very alarming now, I fancy, as that rich, miserly old-bachelor uncle, whose heir he was to be, is as mad as a March hare about it, they say, and his salary is absurdly small to marry on, of course."

"What a fool he has made of himself!"

It did not look very worldly-wise in Tom certainly, and yet, when one knew all the facts of the case, one could hardly blame him. Ever since Tom Coleman and Jessie Hayes had first known each other—three years ago, when Tom had just graduated—they had loved each other, and when one morning he received a letter from her, all blotted with tears, telling him of her mother's death, he went as fast as cars could carry him to the village where she lived. He found Jessie, her sweet blue eyes streaming with tears, as she bent despairingly over the calm face of her dead mother, an orphan, and all alone in the world. So he put his strong arm round her, and said, with a depth of tenderness and love in his manly voice:

"Jessie, my own darling, be my wife, and let me have the right to protect you and take care of you, now and always."

And so, one quiet, sweet summer morning a little while after, they were married. The very day after the wedding, Tom's uncle, Mr. Hague, of New York, wrote him a cutting letter, in which he told him that as he had chosen, in direct opposition to his wishes, to marry and throw himself away for a pretty face, he would of course be willing to live on love and beauty for the rest of his days, and so he, his uncle, being anxious to spare him the necessity of looking after such unpoetical things as money and real estate, had made a new will, leaving his earthly dross to another nephew, who did not yet consider himself ethereal enough to do without money. Tom tore up the letter with a sigh, for it is not a pleasant thing to lose a fortune, and this was the only secret he ever kept from his little wife. She remained in blissful ignorance of Mr. Hague's very existence, till a gossiping friend one day told her the whole story, thereby grieving her sadly, and yet, kindling her with new devotion for her husband, who had given up so much for her sake.

They hired a very small but snug house in Boston, and went to housekeeping at once, in a very plain, simple way; for Tom did not conceal from Jessie that he was poor, dependent on a very small salary. She did not know, till he told her now, that his father, an eminent lawyer, who had always lived in the most lavish style up to the time of his death, died insolvent, and she had often sighed when she first knew him, to think how great the difference between them in a worldly point of view. So now her sweet, delicate little face only brightened at the intelligence, and she determined in her heart to be the best poor man's wife that ever was.

They were very happy, and not in the least ashamed of their poverty. Tom had as little false pride as his modest, gentle wife, and when his friends would propose some expensive plan or amusement, would answer laughing and without a blush, "Should be happy to, but can't afford it, you know." And when their friends visited them, they were as cordial and hospitable as if they lived in a palace, but made no apologies for anything, doing the honors of what they had, without embarrassment or affectation.

Jessie proved a perfect treasure to her husband—the sunniest, sweetest little woman that ever made a man's home full of sunshine and peace. What a thrifty housekeeper she was, too! Keeping the house like wax-work with her own little hands, and doing so much with so little, that she was an unfailing wonder to Tom. Their small parlor was furnished in the plainest way, and yet, her busy fingers and exquisite taste contrived to make it the prettiest, cosiest little nest imaginable, with her pictures—for she drew charmingly—and Tom's engravings—relics of his bachelor days—in beautiful frames of her own making, of leather-work and cones and acorns, and even autumn leaves pressed and varnished, and graceful little brackets, and vases of potichmanie, and other knickknacks, all of her own devising, and the way she had of arranging everything with a nice eye for color and effect. Yet, with all her multifarious occupations, she always found time to make herself look neat and pretty for her husband's eyes, knowing his horror of a dowdy woman, and when he told her how she looked charming in that dress, or exclaimed, "Where did that bewitching little bonnet come from, Jessie?" you should have seen the arch look and blush of pleasure with which she answered triumphantly, "I made it myself, dear Tom!"

When they had been married two years, such a fair, tiny, cunning little baby as came and made their cup of happiness fairly run over, they both thought, of course, had never been seen in this lower world before. It was baptized Margaret, for Jessie's mother, but they called her Daisy mostly, a pet name. Tom's salary had been increased a little, but with this increase in their number, they had still to be very economical to make both ends meet at the end of the year. Still, they managed to in some way, and Coleman never broke his rules of never borrowing, and never running in debt. His uncle he had never seen nor heard from since the angry letter already alluded to, for he and Jessie would have gone without their daily bread, sooner than ask him to help them.

They were sitting on the sofa together one evening, enjoying quietly the winter twilight, the room lighted only by the grate fire, the parlor door ajar that they might hear the slightest sound made by Daisy—now a year old—as she lay asleep in her cradle up stairs.

"O!" exclaimed Jessie, lifting her head from Tom's shoulder, after one of those long pauses when one is too contented to talk, "I want to tell you about a poor woman I went to see this afternoon, actually suffering from want, and with a sick child that can't live, I'm sure; and her landlord is going to drive her out of the miserable room she hires, unless she pays her quarter's rent that is due, and she has no other place in the world to go to! Poor creature, I pitied her so! But I hadn't any money in my purse, so I promised to send her a dollar in the morning. I had nearly forgotten to ask you for it."

Tom loved her all the more for the tender heart and willing hand that could not bear to turn away the wretched and needy, and made her many a time deny herself, thinking it is "more blessed to give," but to-night he said, very soberly:

"I'm very sorry," Jessie, darling, but I don't see how I can possibly spare even a dollar now. My quarter's salary is due next Thursday, though, and I can give it to you then. Wont that do?"

Jessie shook her head sadly. "The landlord comes Saturday. She will be so disappointed, I wish I hadn't promised her."

"I would give it to her gladly, if I could, Jessie. How such things make me wish I was rich!"

A dead pause, both looking into the fire. Then Jessie raised her head again. "I've thought of a way to save the dollar for her. Supposing we were to have only bread and butter for dinner to-morrow, instead of roast beef?"

"Characteristic!" exclaimed Tom, laughing outright, as he smoothed the soft, wavy hair that shaded the eager little face, turned up to his. "I never should have thought of the idea! But I'm willing certainly, if only for the fun of the thing; and then, your bread and butter is by no means unpalatable; we might easily have a worse dinner. Your poor woman shall have the dollar we shall literally take out of our mouths, and we shall be all the better for it."

Jessie's face was radiant, as she pocketed the money. How they both laughed next day when they sat down to dinner! The table was laid with the exquisite neatness that distinguished it always, and in the middle only a plate of Jessie's snow-white bread and a ball of rich, yellow butter! Jessie had carried the money to the object of her charity, who said it would make up the rent with what she had before, and showered blessings and tears of gratitude on her. So she was in a high state of happiness. Tom caught the infection of her glee, and the little dining-room could not have echoed to a merrier couple, if they had been partaking of a banquet of the costliest dainties, and most delicious wines. All at once, there was a ring at the door.

"Nobody come to dine with us, I hope, for their sakes," exclaimed Jessie, with a ringing laugh, as she spread her bread, confident that it was only a handbill.

"A pretty joke if it were!" Tom answered, listening as Nancy—the little girl of fourteen, who was their only servant, opened the door. There stood old Mr. Hague, carpet-bag in hand.

"Goodness! it's my uncle!" exclaimed Tom, starting up from the table, as he caught a glimpse of the tall, gaunt form in rusty black, the door leading into the entry being open.

The old man had been East on business, and having two hours in Boston before the train left for New York, proposed to spend those at his nephew's, partly out of curiosity, to see how "the young scapegrace" had got along since his marriage, and partly to save the expenses of a dinner. He was never troubled with feelings of delicacy, and didn't much care whether he should be welcome or not. Seeing them at the table, he paid no attention to Nancy, who threw open the parlor-door, but marched straight into the dining room, in a way that was, to say the least, slightly unceremonious.

"Why need he have come to-day of all days, when we have such a dinner!" was Jessie's mental ejaculation.

Tom was rather chagrined himself. He wouldn't have cared much if it had been anybody in the world but his uncle. There was nothing of this apparent in his manner, however. As gentlemanly and self-possessed as usual, he went forward to meet him, extending his hand and saying:

"Uncle, this is an unexpected—"

"Pleasure, eh?" interrupted the old man, in a satirical tone. "I thought it would be; that's one reason I called. You know it's a good while since I saw you last—not since your marriage," he added, with a grim smile, and eying Jessie from head to foot with a keen glance of his small gray eyes, that made her feel more uncomfortable than ever in her life before. Tom immediately introduced him to his wife, and then expressing in a quiet way his regret that they had nothing more substantial to offer him, asked him to dine with them. So they all sat down at the table, and while Tom did the honors of the bread and butter with as much courtesy as if he had been presiding at an elegant dinner, he was inwardly in a high state of amusement at the ludicrousness of the thing, as it came across him that if his uncle had come, as he guessed, for the sake of his dinner, he must be sorely disappointed. Mr. Hague, however, being really, as he said, quite indifferent to the pleasures of the table—nobody could have doubted it after once dining with him at home—seemed quite pleased with the plain fare; he even regarded Jessie with a look that was almost gracious, when she told him that the bread he praised was made by herself. She began to get over the dread of the old ogre that he had at first inspired her with, and secretly resolved to propitiate him, since she had been the one to offend him in the first place, by presuming, though a portionless girl, to marry his nephew. She it was who kept up the flagging conversation with her animated words and tones, yet with the greatest tact keeping clear of all subjects on which they would be likely to differ, and gave life and spirit to the party. She exercised all her powers of pleasing on her stern, ungracious guest; as Tom laughingly told her afterwards, "flirting with him to that degree, it positively made him jealous." He had never seen her more agreeable, more bright and attractive than in entertaining the very one whom it was least expected he could please. She made one great mistake, however; that was in displaying Daisy to him, as she lay asleep in her cradle, her white, dimpled arms tossed round her head, her light hair clustering in damp curls about her fair, sweet face, half-smiling in her dreams. He did not approve of babies, viewed them strictly as "incumbrances," and only gave an emphatic "Humph!" when the proud little mother exclaimed, "Doesn't she look like one of Raphael's cherubs?"

In fact, Jessie found him very hard indeed to soften, and was quite discouraged when he went away seeming as cold and indifferent to her as when he came. A real sense of relief came over her when she heard the door close after him, and she told her husband so.

"Never mind," said he, with a laugh in his handsome brown eyes, "there is no danger of his ever troubling us again, after such a dinner as we treated him to!"

How surprised the young couple would have been, if they had known that that dinner of bread and butter had made the most favorable impression on the old man's heart! Its plainness and economy delighted him, and stood out in the most excellent contrast to the elegant champagne supper at which he had surprised his nephew whom he had made his heir, the last time he went to see him. He had never forgiven that champagne supper, and his heart leaned to Tom when he thought of the difference. How fortunate he never dreamed that charity was at the bottom of the frugality he admired! The result of that dinner was a new will, in which this admirable young man who was such a pattern of thrift in the old man's eyes, had a splendid fortune bequeathed him. There was a grim smile on the old man's withered face, as he locked the precious document in his safe, and thought of the consernation with which Tom's cousin would one day learn that he had willed him only the sum of fifty dollars, "with which," so the will ran, "he may give as many champagne suppers as he chooses."

One evening, just a year from this time, Tom Colman received the news of his uncle's death, and his own good fortune. His astonishment was unbounded, and his manly face was gleaming with happiness when he approached his home with a quick springing step, and saw his loving little wife watching for him as usual, at the front window. He could not mourn for his uncle, who was too hard and morose to create affection in any heart; he was too honest to assume a grief he did not feel.

"Jessie," said he, in the quietest tone he could command, as he sat down on the sofa and drew her towards him, "I have just received a letter informing me of my uncle's death—Mr. Hague, you know."

"Poor man!" she said, pityingly, "he has had a cheerless life, for all his wealth!" Then she added, in a low voice, and with a little sigh, "How rich you would be now if you hadn't married me, dear Tom!"

"Of course," he answered, laughing. "But only think how rich you would be now, if, instead of foolishly taking up with me, you had married that wealthy old farmer with the auburn wig—don't interrupt me, Jessie, it was not red—who wanted you as the second wife of his bosom, and mother of his six small but interesting boys!"

"I've always regretted that I didn't," said Jessie, demurely.

"So have I," said Tom.

Then, able to restrain himself no longer, he suddenly caught his astonished wife in his arms, and kissing her again and again, exclaimed, in a voice deep with feeling, "Jessie, darling, a new will has been discovered, in which my uncle has made me his heir once more!"

Jessie's beautiful eyes were brimming with tears as she looked up into her husband's face, smiling through them.

"Then, after all, you didn't lose everything by marrying me, did you? O you do not know how it has weighed upon me thinking of it, when I saw you working so hard for my sake and Daisy's always!"

"You foolish little woman!" Tom exclaimed, stooping to kiss her again that she might not see the tears that filled his own eyes now, "do I not owe everything I am, everything I hope to be, to you? Wasn't it the thought of your pure little face that saved me from dissipation and ruin before we were married? And ever since, haven't you made my home the very happiest a man ever had? And now, through your sweet charity, I am restored as heir to this great fortune."

"How?" she asked, in astonishment.

"Wasn't it you," said Tom, resuming his old, playful manner, "who proposed the sumptuous repast which graced our board the day my uncle came in upon us so unexpectedly? The poor old gentleman was so impressed by our astonishing economy on that occasion, that he went straight home and made his will in my favor. To be sure, my dear—so his lawyer who drew up the will, wrote me to-day. We owe our wealth to your dinner of bread and butter, in other words, your loving pity for the poor."

You should have seen Jessie's face then—it was radiant. Their evening prayer was all thanksgiving that night.

THE CLIMATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Dan Marble was once strolling along the wharves in Boston, when he met a tall, gaunt-looking figure, a "digger" from California, and got into conversation with him. "Healthy climate, I suppose?" "Healthy! it aint anything else. Why, stranger, there you can choose any climate you like, hot or cold, and that without taavellin' more than fifteen minutes. Jest think o' that the next cold mornin' when you get out o' bed. There's a mountain there—the Sawyer Navaday they call it, with a valley on each side of it, the one hot, and t'other cold. Well, get on the top of that mountain with a double-barrelled gun, and you can, without movin', kill either summer or winter game, jest as you will!" "What! have you ever tried it?" "Tried it! often; and should have done pretty well, but for one thing." "Well, what was that?" "I wanted a dog that would stand both climates. The last dog I had froze off his tail while pintin' on the summer side. He didn't get entirely out of the winter side, you see—trew as you live." Marble sloped.—St. Louis Herald.

PROPHECY.

A thousand years hence, and things will be much simpler. Nations have been able to preserve their individuality in spite of the march of armies from one end of the continent to the other. Since the great epoch of Columbus and Gama, when one quarter, nay, one hemisphere of the globe made acquaintance with the other, that restless element, the sea, has made the ubiquity of a certain species of civilization, that of Western Europe, a possibility. Across each boundary line of the firm earth new manners, new beliefs, new wants, force their way among the most isolated clusters of remote lands. Are not the South Sea Islands already Protestant parishes? A floating battery, a single man-of-war, changes the fate of Chili.—Humboldt's Letters.

DESIRABLE GOOD.

An elegant sufficiency, content,
Retirement, rural quiet, friendship, books,
Ease and alternate labor, useful life,
Progressive virtue, and approving Heaven!

MY HOME.

BY EDWIN R. BRIGGS.

Where grows the lofty forest tree,
Where is heard the humming bee,
Where the robin builds its nest,
There 's the home I love the best.
There, there, near the "Maple Grove,"
There, there is the home I love.

Where the pinks and roses fair
Blossom in the garden rare,
Where violets and dahlias bloom.
There 's the place that I call home.
There, where all is fair and bright,
There 's the home of my delight.

Where the forests oft resound
With the sweet and lovely sound
Of the whip-poor-will at night,
There 's the home of my delight.
There, there I can sweetly rest,
There 's the home I love the best.

There at close of day I find Friends to meet me ever kind;
Pleasures there without alloy,
There 's my home—my home of joy.
From that home I 'll never rove,
There 's the home, the friends I love.

In this earthly home I 'll live and die,
And then for a home—a home on high:
A home of happiness and love,
A home of rest, a home above.
While in my happy home I stay,
For a home above I 'll ever pray.

My earthly home is very fair,
But ever weary with toil and care;
In the home above, all, all at rest,
There 's the home I love the best.
There, when I am called to die,
May I find a home—a home on high.

SAVED FROM MURDER!*A VERITABLE SEA STORY.***

BY MC'L. DUNCAN.

In the year 1796, there dwelt at Blackwell, near the Isle of Dogs, upon the banks of the river Thames, Bob Cameron, his wife and daughter. The house in which they lived was at the western end of the island near what is now the entrance to the city canal, and was several hundred yards distant from the nearest building. Old Bob, as he was familiarly named by troops of friends, had passed the best part of his life at sea in ships of war, and had taken part in many naval engagements. In Lord Howe's action of the first of June, 1794, his left arm was badly shattered by a splinter, but he would not permit it to be amputated. The wounds healed, but left the arm stiff, so he was invalided upon a small pension, and "settled down for life" in his present habitation. He married at sea some twenty-two years before. His wife was the widow of a chum, who was mortally wounded in an action with a French frigate. Before he died he called Bob to him in the cockpit, and said:

* We give this sketch verbatim, as written out by the author, who has been many years in the British navy.—

"You see, Bob, I'm bound to 'kingdom come;' the doctor says I can't hold on another hour. Now what I want, Bob, before I go, is to see you spliced to my Susan (kiss me, Sue); she's a good girl, God bless her, and because she's good, I want her to have a good fellow in my place, and I don't know anybody on board that I would like to have her, better than you, Bob; so send for the parson."

When the chaplain arrived, he tried to argue with the dying man that it was not lawful to marry another, while the first husband lived; but Ned Parr, that was his name, said there was no law aboard the Dolphin but the captain's orders, and he was sure the captain would not deny his dying coxswain's request. The captain was appealed to, and descended to the cockpit, for he really liked his coxswain, and felt sorry for his fate.

"How are you, my brave Ned?" inquired the captain, taking hold of his hand.

"Good for two bells longer, the doctor says; but I want my Sue to be spliced to my chum, Bob, before I slip my moorings. The parson says it's wrong, but a word from you can make it right; so I've sent for you."

"Marry them at once," said the captain. "Ned shall have his wish gratified, in spite of all law."

And married they were, without a word of comment from the parson.

"God bless you, noble captain, I shall now die happy. Kiss Sue for my sake; she's been true to me, and will be true to my chum."

The captain kissed the bride, who was weeping as if her heart would break. She submitted to the dying request of her husband, because she thought it would please him, and not because she had any affection for Bob. Poor creature, her heart was too tender and true to be indifferent to the common feelings of humanity. She loved Ned, and felt at the time that she could never love another. Neither she nor Bob left his side until his eyes were closed in death.

"I'm happy, Sue; I'm happy, Bob; God bless you!" were his dying words.

Thus, in a dreary hole, about five feet high, among the wounded and the dying, whose blood moistened the sanded deck, and by the gloomy light of a few tallow candles, was Bob Cameron married to Susan Parr. The enemy's colors had not been struck more than three hours; the prize was hardly secured, the decks were but half cleared up, when a captain in the flush of victory condescended to gratify the dying request of a common sailor! This passed from mouth to mouth among his crew, and redounded more to his credit than the victory he had so gallantly achieved. His name was Brenton, all honor to it!

Susan had a daughter by Bob a couple of years afterwards, and was lodged in the captain's cabin during her confinement. The three remained at sea until Bob was invalided. Young Susan was a pretty girl of eighteen at the time of our story, and resided with her parents. Old Bob was still a fine, hearty man of forty-five, and his wife, though forty, was not only good looking, but finely formed, and blessed with rosy health. Bob was Lord Howe's coxswain when wounded, and his lordship made him a present of fifty guineas, when he was discharged. With this money he purchased a horse and light cart, and set up as a travelling dealer in vegetables, the proceeds of which, with his pension, enabled him to support his family comfortably.

Like most seamen of the period, he was superstitious, a believer in ghosts, mermaids, and witches. One night, a year or so after he left the sea, he awoke his wife to tell her a dream. He dreamed that he saw his horse, which he left grazing on the side of Dogs, struggling for life in a square hole like a grave, and felt so uneasy that he proposed to turn out and see if anything was the matter with old Dobbin; but his wife persuaded him to try and go to sleep again. The dream was repeated, and at the third time, his wife also awoke, screaming:

"Go, Bob, go, he will kill her!"

Bob was up and rigged in a minute. The night, though pleasant, was hazy, not a breath of air disturbed the stillness, and but few stars peeped through the vapory clouds, as Bob hurried along to the place he had tethered his horse the preceding evening. Walking upon the embankment which kept the river from overflowing the island, his attention was attracted to a square hole, like the grave he had seen in his dream. He examined it, and found a pick and shovel in its vicinity.

"Something dark here," said Bob, muttering to himself. "I must keep a lookout, and stop foul play." And he withdrew from the spot and concealed himself in the shade of the embankment.

A few minutes afterwards, a man and woman seated themselves near him, and the following dialogue ensued:

"Well, dear William," said the woman, "have you made your mind up when we shall be married? You must not put me off another week, for I fear my mother will discover all."

"Susan, I'll be plain with you, for once. I cannot marry you—I'm engaged to another—now don't interrupt me, and I'll tell you all. You know Miss Wood, the merchant's daughter? Well, I pulled her and her father across the river to Greenwich about a month ago, and she fell desperately in love with me, so much so that her father sent for me, and said I might have her for my wife. I consented, we met and kissed, and next week we are going to be married. I am very poor, and she is very rich, though not half so pretty as you. Now what I propose to you is this—to swear upon the Bible that you will never expose your connection with me, and I will provide for you like a lady."

"And is this all?" inquired Susan, calmly, as she rose to her feet. "William, you do not know me; but now I know you, and I'm glad I do, for I would rather be disgraced, than marry such a man. My father and mother are kind, and will forgive me."

"Then," said William, in raptures, springing from the ground, "you'll swear not to expose me?"

"Never!" cried Susan, stepping back, "I will leave that to my father."

"But you must swear, or by Heaven I'll kill you! Swear at once, or you shall die; and to show you that I'm in earnest, there is your grave all ready for you!"

"Keep back, sir," replied Susan, stepping from him. "You kill me, indeed! What do you think I'm made of? I, the daughter of a man-of-war's-man, born at sea in a frigate; I, who have again and again played the powder monkey in carrying cartridges to the guns in action, when brave men fell all around me, and I was wet, soaking wet with their blood; I, who never slept in a cradle, but swung in a hammock, among the bravest of the brave, exposed to storms and all the horrors of war, and sometimes, more deadly pestilence; I, to be afraid of you, or your threats, to kill me! False coward, I defy you!"

"And so do I!" roared old Bob, fetching the fellow a dig under the ear that sent him sprawling upon the ground.

"Hold him down, father," said Susan, "till I disarm him, the fellow must have a knife or a pistol on him."

Before she had time to overhaul him, they were surrounded by a presgang, who, without asking questions, handcuffed the men, and told Susan to go home and tell their friends that they would be taken proper care of. His most gracious majesty would provide them with board and lodging for ever and a day.

They were carried on board of a tender at Deptford, and bundled below for the rest of the night. Next morning they were examined, when Old Bob was discharged, unfit for service, but William Watkins, the handsome waterman, was retained and forwarded with despatch to join a frigate at the Nore. Miss Wood and her father felt grateful to Bob, who had saved them from disgrace, and pledged themselves to provide for Susan and her child, a pledge which they religiously fulfilled. Susan gave birth to a fine boy, who received an excellent education, and, when fourteen years of age, through Mr. Wood's influence, was entered as a midshipman in the royal navy, under the patronage of Captain Clay, who had married Miss Wood.

William Watkins was a fine-looking young man of twenty-two years of age, and was better educated than the general run of watermen. He could read and write very well, and had some knowledge of French and Spanish, which he had picked up in his intercourse with the crews of vessels, to London. He had a natural aptitude for the acquisition of foreign languages. When he joined the frigate, he was stationed in the afterguard, and consequently was always under the eyes of the officers. The usage on board of her was very severe, if not cruel, for most of the crew were green hands, and required to be broken in. He reflected much upon his conduct towards Susan, he remembered her love for him, and the bloody end he designed for her, and while he pondered over these, he wept like a child.

When the frigate arrived at Gibraltar, he wrote Susan a long and contrite letter, begging her forgiveness, and to show that he was not so unfeeling as she had reason to think him, he sent her an order to draw his half pay. He said if she would forgive him, he would marry her the first opportunity, and show by his future life that he was not unworthy of her. Susan kept the letter to herself, and only revealed its contents to her son, when he left her to enter the navy. In her heart she still loved him, and charged her son, if he ever fell in with him, to treat him kindly; but she never touched his pay nor answered his letter. She had made her mind up to forget him.

Years rolled away, young Watkins became a man, and for distinguished services, obtained command of the eighteen-gun corvette, Reindeer. As he was an energetic officer, he was despatched by the admiral on the West India station, to cruise among the islands in search of pirates, and at the same time was cautioned to keep his weather-eye open for a swift French frigate that had been playing the mischief with British merchantmen. He landed upon one of the Keys near Cuba, where he surprised a party of pirates, and put them to the sword. In searching the Key for plunder, he discovered a cave in which were several prisoners, who expected death before sunset, and large quantities of merchandize. With his booty and the men, he returned to Jamaica, and after taking in supplies of water and provisions, sailed again. Several of the prisoners volunteered for his vessel, and among them an Englishman, named Carter, who was perfectly familiar with the navigation of the West Indies.

At daylight, on the morning of the second day after leaving port, he found himself almost alongside of a French frigate, which hailed him. Carter saw that escape was impossible, and requested the captain to allow him to answer the hail, and at the same time suggested to hoist Spanish colors. Carter answered in Spanish that the corvette was last from Havana, and was cruising in search of pirates; but the Frenchman was not deceived. He not only knew that she was British, but knew the vessel, and all about her; he therefore ordered her, in good English, to round to and send her boats on board of the frigate, or he would open fire upon her. The vessels were to the northward of Cuba, about six miles distant, with a good working breeze from the south. Both were headed to the eastward, with starboard tacks on board, close-hauled, the corvette to the leeward of the frigate.

The Frenchman felt so sure of the corvette as a prize, that he hesitated to fire, and was somewhat thrown off his guard by her hoisting Spanish colors. Captain Watkins, perceiving that he was discovered, at once assumed command, and while the mainsail was hauling up, and the top-sail thrown aback, ordered one of the boats to be lowered. The frigate also hauled her mainsail up, rounded to, and dropped her quarter-boats fully manned and armed. In a minute, the corvette threw all her square sails aback fore and aft, and made a stern board from under the guns of the frigate, then boxed off and filled away on the larboard tack, displaying English colors at her mizzen peak, as she gathered way. This evolution was performed by the time the Frenchman's boats were alongside, but these, perceiving the new turn of affairs, returned. In the meantime, the frigate, by having her maintopsail aback, lost steerage way, and conceiving escape impossible, was not so prompt in her motions as she might have been. Her captain, moreover, instead of following the corvette's example in throwing all aback, and beating her at her own game, actually filled away the maintopsail, and set the mainsail to give her headway. This manœuvre widened the distance between her and the corvette, and to make the position worse, she lost time in hoisting up her boats, instead of ordering the men to scramble out of them as quickly as possible, and let them go. Their dragging alongside for two or three minutes must have impeded the frigate's progress. As she went in stays, she fired a raking broadside at the corvette, aimed high for the purpose of dismantling her, but the uncertain motion, peculiar to any vessel in stays, destroyed its intended effect, for only a few shot passed through the corvette's sails. Both vessels were excellent sailers, but with a double-reefed topsail breeze, and a rough sea, the frigate would have proved the better vessel. The sea and breeze were now, however, in favor of the corvette, which let her boat go the instant it had answered the purpose of deceiving the Frenchman into the belief that she had surrendered. Both vessels were now on the larboard tack, headed westerly, and sometimes not more than a mile apart, carrying all drawing sail, and going between six and seven knots. The frigate fired her bow chasers, which were answered by the stern guns of the corvette, but neither produced much effect. Thus they continued running and firing until noon, when black clouds were seen rising rapidly in the east. Carter, the pilot, informed Captain Watkins, that a hurricane was brewing, and would probably burst upon them in a few minutes, and enable the frigate to overhail them.

Captain Watkins immediately gave orders to stopper the clews of the topsails and top-gallant sails, single their earings, unreeve the sheets and all other gear, and then stationed men along the yards to cut away the sails at a moment's notice. Her only hope of escape lay in being able to carry sail to the last, and get rid of it the instant she was struck, without loss of spars.

On came the tempest, black as night, heaping up the sea before it into whitened foam, the lightning flashed, the thunder pealed and roared, and the rain was pouring in torrents. The frigate took in her royals and staysails, and so did the corvette, but both kept all other sail set. As the frigate was astern, and the hurricane approaching from the eastward, she commenced squaring her after yards, when it burst upon her with tremendous effect. She flew up in the wind, and in a twinkling her three topmasts went over the side, all her sails were swept away, she heeled over until the water washed through her maindeck ports, and for a moment threatened to founder her; but eventually she was got before the wind. The corvette was more fortunate; she was before the wind, and had her sails cut away the moment she was struck. Her topsails and courses, by the judicious use of spilling lines, fell on deck, but the top-gallant sails, jib and spanker, were torn in pieces by a single blast, and flew in shreds before the tempest. Occasional flashes of lightning revealed both vessels running before the gale, about three miles apart, the frigate towing the wreck of her spars alongside. The hurricane, or what is now termed a cyclone, took a turn around the compass, and in two hours subsided into a strong gale from the northward. When the weather cleared, the corvette found herself upon a lee shore, not three miles distant, and had not a stitch of sail bent to work off. The lead was cast, but no bottom found with eighty fathoms of line; she could not, therefore, anchor, and had not time to bend sails; destruction seemed inevitable.

In this emergency, Carter, the pilot, said that he would carry her safely through a passage in the reef which he pointed out, and which he said had just water enough for her to enter, and that once inside, she could be anchored without difficulty, and ride till the gale abated. Captain Watkins gave him charge, and he brought her in, though she gave a slight touch on the bottom as she settled between the rollers. She was brought up in seven fathoms' water, with both anchors ahead and shortly afterwards, sent down her top-gallant masts, and housed topmasts. The sea was quite smooth, and she rode easily, though the wind continued blowing a severe gale.

Where was the frigate? About seven miles off, still running before the gale. Her captain had seen the corvette anchor, without observing the reef, and determined to close with her, notwithstanding the loss he had sustained. The wreck of his spars had been cleared away and he had bent new courses. Imagine his horror and mortification, when he discovered the reef between him and his foe. He brought his vessel to the wind, and set the sails he had bent, but they hardly kept steerage way on her, and she drifted bodily to leeward. Seeing no hope of working off, he looked for the channel by which the corvette had entered, and when he thought he saw it once more, after much labor, succeeded in putting his ship before the wind. He took in the mainsail, and under the foresail alone made for the channel. His movements were watched with deep interest from the corvette.

Captain Watkins appealed to Carter if he thought she could thread her way in?

"Not unless she draws as little water as we do, sir," he replied, "and, I believe she is, at least, two feet deeper; she will surely strike and become a wreck. In view of such an event, I would respectfully suggest to hoist our boats out and try to save some of her poor fellows."

"Carter," said the captain, "may she not run in by throwing her guns overboard as she shoals her soundings?"

"She will not have time, sir; strike she must, I know every inch of the channel as well as I do the deck of this vessel. She draws eighteen feet of water at least, and there are only sixteen upon the inner bar, at the highest tides. We grazed the bottom ourselves, running in."

Captain Watkins immediately gave orders to hoist the boats out and man them, and pull out under the lee of the reef, and there await the fate of the frigate, which had now made good her entrance into the channel. Slowly but gradually she rose upon the swell, and anon settled almost out of sight between the rollers, which curled and foamed as high as her hammock-nettings. The leadsmen were in the channels, the captain and first lieutenant on the bow, and a line of men along the deck, passing the orders to the helmsman. She passed the outer bar in safety, and had nearly reached smooth water, when she struck bottom between the seas, then rose and struck again, the foresail shivered in the wind, a roller struck her on the quarter, she canted broadside to the swell, and, in a minute was lying with her starboard maindeck ports in the water, while the breakers combed over her with awful force, driving her further upon the bar at every bound. To ease her the masts were cut away, but the men were unable to reach the lee rigging, from the wreck of the spars that were driven against the sides and deck by the back swash of the sea. The corvette's boats soon reached the scene of the wreck, but were unable to near the frigate on account of the wreck of her spars.

Carter, who spoke French well, at the risk of being crushed, hauled himself alongside of her by the lee rigging of the mainmast, and was followed by six others. These, by lashing cutlasses and saws to the ends of boarding-pikes, showed the Frenchman how to cut away the rigging, and thus clear her side, to enable the boats to save her crew. Before this was accomplished night had set in, and still the gale continued, and still the rolling surge dashed over the wreck. The frigate was the Pomone, of forty guns, Captain Laborde, and if she had not been a very strong vessel would have broken up an hour after she struck. Her captain was an experienced officer, but rather too daring, yet in this time of trouble he was calm and prudent. He would not allow the men to leave, until there was a fair prospect of their being saved. In vain Carter urged him to allow them to go in the corvette's boats, which were dodging to leeward of the reef waiting the signal to approach.

"While the frigate holds together," replied Laborde, "there is no danger; but there is danger of loss of life in boats, while such a heavy sea is running; and though I have lost my vessel, I am most anxious to save my men; a few hours' soaking is not of much consequence. The men will remain while I am with them."

The fact was he did not understand the management of boats, and Carter perceived it. The first lieutenant of the corvette, who commanded the boats, impatient at not receiving the concerted signal, dashed alongside of the wreck, bow on and stern off, and jumped on board of her. Seeing that she had four boats on deck in good condition, he went to work, John Bull fashion, utterly regardless of the presence of Captain Laborde, and with the aid of his own men, and some of the frigate's crew, launched them successfully, and ordered men into them. Captain Laborde interfered, but the lieutenant answered gruffly, that his orders were to save life, and he was going to carry them out; and he did so. The boats were called alongside one at a time, loaded and despatched to the corvette, which was only a mile and a half distant. All that night and next day were occupied in saving the men and such of their effects as would be reached. The corvette was crowded on deck and below. In addition to her own crew of eighty men, she had three hundred and sixty Frenchmen on board, who might have captured her, had they been so disposed; but Captain Watkins had implicit confidence in the honor of the French commander, though he took the precaution of filling his tops with small arms and men, to be prepared for any emergency. The rules of the service required this at his hands.

Three days afterwards the gale abated; the frigate still held together, and Captain Watkins placed a dozen men on board of her as a prize-crew. He then got under way, and was piloted clear of the reefs through another channel by Carter. In a couple of days he reached Kingston, Jamaica, and landed the Frenchmen. The admiral was highly gratified at his conduct, which had been the means of destroying a very troublesome enemy. With the generosity of a true sailor, the admiral regarded the Frenchmen as shipwrecked mariners, and fitted a vessel for their reception; gave them the protection of a cartel, and sent them to France. Though the nations were at war, the French government acknowledged the compliment through a neutral power, which resulted in the promotion of Captain Watkins to post rank. As captain of the corvette, his rank was only that of master-commander. A working party and a frigate were sent to the wreck, and succeeded in saving all her material; and eventually hove her off, patched her bottom, and brought her to Jamaica. For this the corvette's crew received prize-money.

The corvette was ordered home, and in due time arrived at Chatham to undergo repairs. Through the influence of Captain Watkins, who was appointed to the command of a new frigate, Carter received a gunner's warrant; but the promotion did not seem to elate him. He was a man in the prime of life, between forty and fifty, vigorous, intelligent, and an excellent seaman, but when alone, seemed absorbed in deep thought. He seldom spoke when his duty did not require it.

When the new frigate was nearly ready for sea, a small party, consisting of an old man and his wife, accompanied by a stately woman of rare beauty, called on board to see the captain. He was not on board, but the boat was ashore waiting for him. The gunner was standing by the gangway when the visitors stepped on the deck; but the instant his eyes met the gaze of the younger woman, he staggered against the mainmast, turned sharply round and walked forward. The officers of the deck, while waiting on the visitors, did not perceive him; but he was seen by one whose eyes followed him, till he was hid by the launch. She was calm and self-possessed.

Shortly after the captain came on board, he ordered the hands to be turned up, and then in company with the visitors walked along their lines as they were ranged fore and aft.

"The man I seek is not here," said the lady, addressing the captain after she had inspected the crew.

"Must the crew fore and aft," said the captain, turning to the first lieutenant; "no one has left the ship, and he must be on board."

When the gunner's name was called, his servant stated that he was below sick, and could not come on deck.

"What, Carter sick!" exclaimed the captain, nervously. "I must see him instantly. He is one of the noblest fellows alive. To his skill and daring I am indebted for my recent promotion. There is not his superior in the British navy. Call the surgeon at once. Excuse me (turning to the visitors), I must go to see Carter."

He was not very sick, for, in a couple of days, he returned to his duty, and was then ordered to visit the captain at his lodgings on shore. The captain was alone when he entered, and requested him to be seated.

"Carter," he said kindly, "I am deeply indebted to you, and feel a strong desire to know your history. Will you please to gratify me?"

"Certainly," replied Carter, in a quiet tone, "for it is easily told in a very few words; but you must pledge your honor to keep it secret, for I have forfeited my life according to the rules of the service."

"Fear nothing, you have my word of honor."

"Well then," he began, "when I belonged to the Junon frigate cruising in the West Indies, the first lieutenant kicked me in the mouth, as I was trying to shove the boat from the beach of a creek on the south side of Cuba. Enraged beyond control, I dragged him down, jumped upon him several times, and then took to my heels inland. The whole affair did not occupy a minute. I escaped, and having a fair knowledge of Spanish, was perfectly at home among the planters, who treated me with kindness. I reached Havana, there joined a wrecker, and in a few years was so successful that I owned several vessels, and was esteemed a man of wealth. The day before you released me, while piloting a vessel inside of the reefs near Key West, I was taken prisoner by pirates, who carried the vessel in the night. The crew were also taken prisoners, for the pirates were afraid to murder us at sea, lest our dead bodies might be seen floating about so near the land. They intended to kill us that night and bury us on shore out of sight, which, thank God, you prevented. The gang to which the pirates belonged, had confederates in all the ports of Cuba, and I did not deem it safe to return, for I would have been assassinated, so I volunteered for your vessel, and let my property go. The fact is, captain, I felt a strong attachment to you, and could not feel happy out of your company. This, sir, is my story."

The captain called for brandy and cigars, and then said:

"Come, Carter, help yourself; here's your health (tossing off a glass). I'm off to London to-morrow, and you shall accompany me; I'm going to have a cruise ashore before I go to sea, and I want you to go with me. But, Carter, you have not told me anything of your early life, when you were a boy, and what sent you to sea."

"The pressgang," he replied, dryly.

"Come, let us have the yarn," said the captain, "and toss off another glass for better acquaintance sake; I'm your friend, you may trust me."

"Captain Watkins, I cannot tell you without debasing myself in my own esteem. I will not tell you!"

"Come, friend Carter, don't be offended, few men are saints if their secret history were known. I feel a warm interest in you, and will not think less of you for the follies or even crimes of your youth. Trust me, I will not deceive you."

"Captain Watkins, as I love you, I will tell you, not for the purpose of gratifying your curiosity, but that my terrible sin may be a warning to you. God grant that you may never be tempted as I have been! Know, then, my name is not Carter, but William Watkins. I was born in Blackwell, and served my apprenticeship to a waterman. In an evil hour—"

"Hold!" cried a lady, stepping from an adjoining room. "Enough. Stand up, gentlemen, and face me." They obeyed, and she continued, "This, Captain Watkins, is your father. This, sir," addressing the gunner, "is your son, and I am his mother! I forgive you, for you have suffered much."

He sank into a chair, his head fell upon the table, he groaned in agony, the blood rushed to his head, and was soon oozing through his mouth and nose. Three months passed away before he recovered consciousness, and the first being he recognized was the injured Susan standing over him, bathing his temples. In a year afterwards they were married, and their son was married at the same time to the daughter of Mrs. Clay, who was the Miss Wood, to obtain whose hand the elder Watkins would have murdered his first and only love. The ways of Providence are truly wonderful, and past finding out.

CONTROLLING THE INCLINATION.

It is hard work to control the workings of inclination, and turn the bent of nature; but that it may be done, I know from experience. God has given us, in a measure, the power to make our own fate; and when our energies seem to demand a sustenance they cannot get—when our will strains after a path it may not follow—we need neither starve from inanition, nor stand still in despair; we have but, to seek another nourishment for the mind, as strong as the forbidden food it longed to taste, and perhaps purer; and to hew out for the adventurous foot a road as direct and broad as the one fortune has blocked up against us, if rougher than it.—Charlotte Brontë.

MISS LEONARD'S FARM:

—AND—

HOW SHE MANAGED IT.

BY A. M. LOVERING.

MISS FANNIE LEONARD turned very pale, and dropped the letter which she had been reading, from her nerveless hands. Looking the whole world over, at just that moment one would scarcely have found a more frightened or surprised person than was this same Miss Fannie. Her eyes—large and exceedingly blue—were distended half way from her head; her mouth—quite broad, but very rosy—was wide apart; her curls—a brown, silken cluster back of either ear—trembled as though they were at frolic with the wind.

Miss Leonard had fallen into possession of a fortune! Not a large one, according to the world's reckoning, but to her idea one that was surprisingly vast. The young lady had had a rough time of it with life. By this, I do not mean that she had ever been a street beggar, or could remember a time when she had been obliged to want for a meal; but at an early age, she had been left fatherless and motherless—to look out and shift for herself in the world. Not being contented to sink down with the ignorant masses, and having quite an idea of educating herself, she found that she had something beside play before her. But Miss Leonard worked well. At twenty-five (for it takes time to work these changes), she was a well-informed, genteel-appearing young lady, and but for a certain sharpness, which comes from hard contact with the world, and an occasional show of bitterness, which seldom finds a place in the hearts of the home-sheltered, one would not have suspected that her walks in life had led her in any other than the most refined circles.

But now Miss Leonard had a fortune—a farm of some forty acres but a few miles removed from the pretty inland city of M—, among the hills of New Hampshire. "That farm," so wrote the legal gentleman who had managed her eccentric relative's affairs, for years, "needed the immediate care of some one; and it was his advice, to the young lady, that she should take up her residence upon it at once."

Blessing her deceased uncle for his kind memory of her (she hadn't thought of him for years before), and dropping a few tears for something, she hardly knew what, Miss Fannie went about gathering up her little stock of movables which heretofore had included her whole store of worldly goods. This was no great task. She had a box of books which must be carefully packed—a black silk dress which must be folded so that it would not wrinkle—beyond this, there wasn't much to care for. In a marvellously short space of time, she was on her way to M——, feeling a little lonely, perhaps, but strangely independent.

Whether to laugh or cry, she did not know, when the coachman set her down at the door of her new home. She thought she had never in her life before looked upon so comical a house—one patched up in so many different styles, as though the builder had been intent upon pleasing a score or more of persons, each one differing essentially from the other in taste. In front, there were large trees; and over the windows looking upon the road, scraggly rose-vines and bushes hung, matted together in a solid mass of leaves. The front door, which she approached with some trepidation, had the appearance of being newly painted, and what to her was exceedingly ludicrous, its color was bright yellow, which contrasted vividly with the sombre gray of the house.

"The old people were making repairs," she said to herself, smiling, as she raised the knocker and gave a heavy rap.

The old people were a worthy couple who had served her uncle for years, and who would look to her for a home—so said the legal gentleman—during the remainder of their lives.

"You are Mrs. Dearborn, I believe," said Fannie to the old lady, as she made her appearance, "and I am Miss Fannie Leonard. I have come to live with you."

So saying, Miss Leonard walked straight into the house, like one having a right. She had, indeed, and she was not timid. From that moment, she was perfectly at home.

The morning following, she went over the house. She was a neat, tidy personage herself, and consequently was not pleased with what she saw. She was a little nervous, too; and as the old lady threw open doors and closets, displaying grimy paint in one direction, and cobwebs, dust and rubbish in another, she was obliged to exercise considerable self-command to keep from speaking her mind about it. But finally she did what was a great deal wiser—put on an old dress and went to cleaning. She looked at her hands two or three times first (he had kept them very pretty and delicate, in spite of everything), but a second glance at the soiled paint determined her.

Now that very afternoon, Miss Leonard met with a sad mishap. She was cleaning paint in what had been her uncle's room, a quaint little place with a low, wide window reaching to the ground, at the back of the house, and as often as she wished to change the water in her basin, threw it out upon a path that ran near by. The last basin of water she threw into some one's face. She started back and clapped her hands.

"Mr. Dearborn!" she exclaimed, trying to control her laughter.

Looking out of the window for the space of half a moment, Miss Leonard saw her mistake. A stranger stood in the path, wiping the dirty water from his eyes and mouth. The young lady could not think of a single word to say. But the gentleman remarked quietly, raising his eyes, "Clean water next time, if you please."

"Certainly, sir," answered Miss Leonard, suddenly finding her tongue.

She was too vexed to apologize, and so arching her neck (this was a trick of hers), she turned straight to her work again.

It was not long before Mrs. Dearborn came to her, saying that Mr. Cauldwell was in the sitting-room, and wished to see her.

"Mr. Cauldwell?" repeated Fannie, blushing.

"Yes, the gentleman who had helped work her uncle's farm for a number of years past. He wanted to see her about it."

After this explanation, she was as ignorant as ever; but on entering the sitting-room, she was evidently a little wiser. This was the gentleman whom she had treated to the contents of her wash-basin a few moments before. She returned his bow as coolly as she could, and seated herself, waiting to hear what he had to say to her. But he did not seem in any hurry to tell his business. He wandered about from one subject to another, talking in a pleasant, easy way of this and that—of everything, in fact, Fannie thought, but what he came to talk about. At last, he hit upon the farm. He would let his men carry it on for her, if she pleased, just as they had done for years past for her uncle.

"And how was that?" she asked.

He smiled at the question, as though he thought it an exceedingly absurd one, but proceeded to answer it with tolerable grace.

Miss Leonard was piqued. He had the right of it, she knew. His drainage, explanation, and long harangue upon pasturing, together with a quantity of trash about potatoes, oats and corn, was like so much Greek to her. But she listened to it very attentively, and bowed knowingly when he finished speaking.

"You understand, I suppose?" he questioned.

"O, yes!" Fannie answered, telling as big a lie as she possibly could.

"And what do you think of it?" he continued.

"That I wish it was all at the bottom of the Red Sea!" she wanted to say—for her brain was sorely puzzled. But instead, she thanked him as well as she could for his kindness, and informed him that she thought she should be able to manage her farm herself.

Mr. Cauldwell smiled again, and Miss Leonard thought to herself that he was the most disagreeable man whom she had met in all her lifetime.

Now I pray the reader not to think my heroine a foolish or senseless girl; on the contrary, she possessed more than an ordinary share of common sense. But somehow she had taken it into her head that Mr. Cauldwell wished to advance his own interests, rather than hers; this, coupled with the serious impression that he thought she was an ignoramus, decided her in the answer which she gave him.

"If there is anything which I can do to assist you, I shall be pleased to do it," Mr. Cauldwell said, rising to go. "My place joins yours, you may have been told."

Miss Leonard thanked him, but hoped that she should not be obliged to trouble him much. So ended the young lady's first interview with her gentlemanly but slightly self-conceited neighbor.

After this, she directed her attention to farming. To relate her adventures as they occurred day after day, would be to write a good-sized volume; but she was persevering, and did not rest until she had her spring's work (it was late at any rate) done. This was accomplished some time in the summer. Her harvesting would come in the dead of winter, she concluded, with the men whom she hired to do her planting.

But her greatest pride was in her garden; and a well-stocked one it was, too, full of cherry trees, currant-bushes and strawberries. What with watering and watching and weeding it, it grew to be the finest garden in town; this, in fact, was because Mr. Dearborn was one of the best of gardeners, although Miss Leonard flattered herself to the contrary. In the meantime, Mr. Cauldwell watched her with curious eyes. He had never before in his life met with so strange and so self-willed a young lady. Although she amused him, he could not help admiring her indomitable perseverance and independence.

But a cloud came gradually upon Miss Leonard's mind. This was the cloud: Mr. Cauldwell's hens scratched in her garden. They had had that privilege for years, and good Mr. Dearborn did not think that it could be restricted.

"Mr. Cauldwell must shut up his hens," Miss Leonard said, closing her pretty mouth firmly together.

Consequently Mr. Cauldwell was soon in possession of a neatly written note which informed him as politely and decisively as possible, that his hens must be kept at home. He did not reply to it. This angered Miss Leonard considerably.

"Of course he thought I was not worth his notice!" she said, curling her pretty lip. "But if he did not shut his hens up, she'd—"

She concluded the sentence with a significant nod of her head.

The next day, the hens scratched in her garden as usual. Seeing them from her window, she bade Mr. Dearborn bring her his gun. It was a rusty, good-for-nothing old fuscus, and so heavy, that she could hardly raise it. But she took aim at the flock of hens, and while they were scattered in one direction, the old gun kicked her in another. Such a flying and cackling as there was! But above all this, there sounded in Miss Leonard's ear a peal of hearty, manly laughter. Mr. Cauldwell had been watching the whole performance through the fence. Looking about her, she saw that the leader of the flock was lying dead among the cucumber vines. She came to a resolution instantly. She would toss him over the fence. This she did with considerable force, and it fell at Mr. Cauldwell's feet.

"Thank you!" was his cool answer.

"You are quite welcome, sir," retorted Miss Leonard, walking away.

Two hours later, her neighbor made his appearance at the kitchen door with a well-dressed fowl in his hand.

"He hoped Miss Leonard would accept it," he said. "He thought it would be very palatable. He believed Mrs. Dearborn was a rare hand at cooking chickens."

Miss Leonard laughed, in spite of herself. She was amused, troubled and vexed. In an undertone, she gave vent to her feelings in a curt French sentence.

Mr. Cauldwell was quick of hearing. In the same tone and language, he answered her.

"Tit for tat," thought Fannie, her cheeks flushing. "She wished that that odious Mr. Cauldwell would stay at home, though. He was the pest of her life." But she said "she hoped he would call upon Mrs. Dearborn or herself, whenever he wished anything done in the cooking line. She should think it would be very disagreeable for a gentleman to prepare his own meals."

Mr. Cauldwell opened his eyes very wide. Was it possible that Miss Leonard thought he did his own cooking?—he, a gentleman who could count his possessions by thousands? His pride was aroused. He was too indignant, for a moment, to answer; and too indignant, by far, to correct the impression which she seemed to have.

"He thanked her, and would remember her promise. He presumed he should be pleased to test its genuineness by-and-by."

This he said, looking her straight in the face. Miss Fannie winced. There was so much insinuated in his quiet, deep tone!

For the next week, the young lady avoided her neighbor. She did not know why—it was a sort of instinct with her. At the expiration of the time, she received a note from him, asking her over to his house to tea. She did not wish to go, but had no excuse for declining his courteous invitation; consequently, she was obliged to accept.

What a polite host was Mr. Cauldwell! How attentive and pleasant he was! How admirably his household affairs were conducted, and in what perfect taste was everything arranged about the house! Cook his own meals indeed! Miss Leonard smiled at the mischievous insinuation, as she sat before his sumptuously-spread table. Her own looked plainly and poorly, in comparison with it.

After tea was served, Mr. Cauldwell sang and played to her. He did this, as though conscious of his superior performance—for he could not help knowing what every person was so soon assured of. But Fannie was piqued by his manner. Did he think her a novice? Did he suppose that she had never seen a piano before? Evidently so, by the way that he turned from it when he had finished playing. Now Fannie was no mean performer, and she had a voice as sweet, rich and clear as a song sparrow. She could not brook Mr. Cauldwell's apparent slight.

"You have gratified me exceedingly, sir," she said, bowing and stepping towards the piano. "Let me endeavor to repay you."

There was a wide-awake flash to her eyes, as she said this—a pretty arching of her white, slender neck. Mr. Cauldwell turned around with evident surprise.

"He knew that Miss Leonard could fire a gun very well," he said, "but he was not aware that she was a musician."

She did not answer him, but touching the keys of the piano with her light, skilful fingers, ran through a difficult opera song with the most perfect correctness. Then she ran off into a sweet old melody, and let her voice out, soft, clear, trilling and birdlike. For weeks she had not sung before, and her voice was in perfect tone. Now it rioted in its sudden freedom.

"I like that," Mr. Cauldwell said. "You are more than repaying me, Miss Leonard; you are making me your debtor. I—"

What was the gentleman about to say, that the young lady should so rudely interrupt him with—"Let us try to sing together, Mr. Cauldwell?"

"Certainly," he answered, biting his full under-lip.

Miss Fannie Leonard went home that night in a pet, after all. She declared to herself, in secret, that for the future she would avoid her neighbor, steadily and perseveringly. A suspicious conclusion for her to come to! Whether a wise one or not, I leave it for some one else to determine.

The next day Miss Leonard's cattle made sad havoc with Mr. Cauldwell's corn. He wrote her a note informing her of the fact. She put on her bonnet, and went over to see him about it. She carried her purse on her arm.

"She could pay for the damage they had done," she said to herself.

Mr. Cauldwell was astounded. "He did not sell his corn-fodder in any such way," he said, laughing. "He should shoot her cows, if she did not keep them at home," he added, roguishly.

"She hoped he would do so; but she should not be as generous as he had been—that was, she should not present him with his game!"

"That would not be very generous, after all," he retorted, laughingly, "since he had no cook. "And that made him think of her promise. Didn't she tell him that she would cook for him whenever he wished her to?"

She was caught there. Dear me, how she blushed over it! Mr. Cauldwell was not at all merciful; he went on talking, regardless of her blushes.

"He had come to the conclusion that they would do well to work in partnership. He thought her a very poor farmer—he was sure he was a poor housekeeper, and—"

She made an effort to slip past him out of the door, as he said this, but he caught her hand.

"How shall it be?" he asked, holding her firmly.

Fannie hung her head, and tried to get away.

"Answer me, if you please. I am quite serious," Mr. Cauldwell said. "Yes or no?"

Now Fannie liked this odd neighbor of hers exceedingly, and so she made the wise answer that she should have made, and that too without hesitation—"Yes!"

I have heard since that they are a model couple, Mr. and Mrs. Cauldwell. So ended Fannie Leonard's farming!

LEARNING TO SWIM.

The best plan for learners, whether in fresh or salt water, is to attach a cord to a tree, or boat, or the machine; or, if these are not available, get a companion to hold the end of the cord on shore. With this cord tied round the arm or waist, let the beginner walk out till the water is up to his chin, and then turn round and face the shore. He may even then back out a little farther, when he will find the force of the water taking him off his legs, and he will then find no difficulty in making a few strokes, even at the first attempt. In fact, by holding the head well up, which necessarily expands the chest, he will find he cannot help himself from swimming, or rather floating; and by gently thrusting out, and drawing in the hands and feet, exactly in imitation of the movement of a frog in the water, he will accomplish more in two or three days than in as many weeks with the corks or bladders—that is, he will have more confidence in himself, and know more of the power of the water to sustain him on its surface. A better knowledge even of this he will have by keeping his back to the shore till out in deep water as far as he can go, then throwing back his head, expanding his chest, making, as it were, a curve with the back, and allowing the legs to float outward and from under him, he will find that his companion on shore could draw him completely in without sinking. A few such experiments, and then he might, by the gentle action of the hands and feet, work himself on shore. With the cord, the young beginner will have no fear, saving for a few mouthfuls of water, and these he will not care about so long as he learns to swim.—Boston Journal.

STUDENTS AND BOOKS.

Dr. Nott, of Union College observes, that he can always tell the young men who are to make their mark in the world, if he can only see them return from a visit to the College Library, which is only open once a week. "If," says he, "I saw a man leaving the library with five or six books under his arm, I would say to myself, there goes a mental glutton, he will read, mark, but not inwardly digest, and the consequence is, he is very likely to have mental dyspepsia; the mind, endeavoring to acquire too much, strains itself and becomes weakened." On the other hand, he says, "If I see a young student taking but a small book from the library, and that he does not return there for some time, I am satisfied that he will saturate his mind with the intellect of the author, and not only gain all the knowledge in the book, but sharpen his perceptions and invigorate every faculty."

There are three kinds of friends—friends who love you, friends who do not trouble themselves about you, and friends who hate you.

WITCHES AND WITCHCRAFT.

The belief in witchcraft is prevalent in most parts of England. Nearly every village and hamlet has its witch. No malice is expressed, simply a dread of offending her, even unintentionally. The unfortunate beings supposed to have fallen under her evil influence are considered marked and doomed; their friends still fearing to speak a word against the reputed author of the calamity. In many instances the bewitched ones leave their homes never to return, to avoid the misery resulting from a solitary life, so many of their own class, even their old companions, disliking to associate with them. I have been in a village in the south of England where the second son, a lad of thirteen, had left his home, and gone to seek his fortune, for "hadn't he had an evil eye cast on him, and couldn't get on at all?" The poor mother, while mourning for the missing one, never doubted the truth of the matter, but considered it "mighty unlucky." This belief not only exists among the very poor and more intelligent laborers, but even many of the better class of farmers, and occasionally thoroughly educated members of the higher ranks of society are infected with it. The latter, however, invariably admit that "cases," as they term them, have never been known to occur in their particular community. In some instances the belief appears hereditary, a plague-spot that can never be washed away. We boast of being "the latest seed of time," we "cry down the past," we talk of the omnipotence of science and philosophy; and well that we can do so. But is it not strange that, in spite of all this real or fancied progress—in spite of our nineteenth-century refinement and civilization—this demon of superstition still remains, lurking in every corner of our land, crushing the minds of its victims in the broad and open day?—Once a Week.

MAKING LOVE.

There is no such process as making love. The article cannot be manufactured. It is the spontaneous growth of the heart. Or rather, it springs from a spiritual seed planted in a warm material soil, and is half a passion flower, and half a heavenly exotic. As the soul survives the body, so the divine essence of love survives its passion instinct. This is always the case where the sentiment is genuine. But, unfortunately, spurious love is as common as spurious money, and as frequently passes current. Many men fancy themselves deeply in love, who have not the slightest idea of what the feeling, in its purity and plenitude, really is. Such persons mistake mere passion for affection. Their love, as they call it, lacks the divine heaven. It is coarse, selfish, unregulated, and being wholly "of the earth, earthy," is sure to be ephemeral. No true woman was ever made permanently happy by such love as this; but, alas! how many place faith in it, and after giving in exchange for it all the wealth of their hearts, find too late that they have made a blind and thriftless bargain.—Truman.

EVENING.

BY ARTHUR L. RESERVE.

The sun goes down in the crimson west
To his bed of purple and gold,
And the amber clouds cover his face
With many a gorgeous fold.
Above his head is a sea of light
Tinged with every royal hue,
And it flickers and burns in the crown of light,
As the daygod says adieu.

Then through this glorious crown of light
Out 'tween the golden bars,
Unsuiled as on earth's first night,
Gleam forth the silver stars.
Then high upon the mountain's crest
Gloweth forth a silver line,
As the queen of night rolls up behind
The darkly-crested pine.

Now the night-winds from their mountain caves
Sigh through the forest leaves,
Waking a note on each tiny harp
That hangs mid woodbine wreaths.
The silver mists come curling up
From the peaceful, sleeping lake
That lays out beside the mountain steep,
Fringed round with hazel brake.
Thus when eve has come adown,
In our glorious summer time,
Happy 's the man who can lay down to rest
'Neath his own toll-planted vine.

THE TRIAL BY FIRE.

BY EDWIN S. MACDONALD.

OVER two centuries ago, a young German belonging to a pious and respectable family, entered Wurtzburg for the express purpose of studying foreign languages, in which branch of study he wished to perfect himself, in order, as he hoped, to be qualified, at some future day, to fill a professor's chair in one of the colleges already established in Germany. His name was Heinrich von Kepler. Tall, finely-formed and handsome, Heinrich bore away the palm of physical beauty, as he soon did of intellectual culture, from among his studious but heavy countrymen; often exciting their envy for one, and their unavailing efforts to rival him in the other.

But while they smoked and drank beer, and pursued their misty speculations in philosophy and their visionary, dreamy theology, Heinrich was advancing in brilliant and rapid progression, beyond them all; outstripping his teachers and exciting wonder and admiration in those who looked at him standing on a height which they never hoped to reach.

His window, in the fourth Wisner's house, showed a bright fire retired for the night, and flame was visible long before the sleepy watchman was just going to his night's vigil. He went seldom into society, but his animated countenance and brilliant conversational powers won for him troops of friends, whenever he was induced to make one of a party.

Many an anxious mother, dwelling upon the reputed wealth and respectability of the von Keplers, would gladly have welcomed the handsome and talented youth to a nearer relationship; and many a Julia, Caroline or Serena would have smiled a blushing assent to any important question he might have asked respecting the state of the affections. But in vain. Heinrich's heart had long since made its election.

Bertha Wisner, the widow's only child, had become strongly attached to the young student, who formed a part of her mother's household. She had never known a brother's love, but the gentleness and sweetness of one who knew so much toward the simple and guileless maiden, had made a deep impression on her heart, and she fancied that she felt for him a sister's affection. Upright and honorable, Heinrich obtained her mother's consent, and then revealed his own love for Bertha.

So much happiness, the artless girl had not counted upon. She could not believe that it would last. She remembered her mother's transient dream of domestic bliss, of which she had often told her—the terrible and sudden death to which the husband of a few short months was doomed; and Bertha's anxious heart and timid spirit seemed to shadow forth her own destiny in dreary similitude to Madam Wisner's. To Heinrich and her mother, there appeared something strange and unnatural in this dread of the future. The lover did not doubt that it was real; but he earnestly entreated her to conquer so fruitless an anxiety, and let time bring its shadows as it might.

"It is in vain, dear Heinrich," she would say; "ever since I have begun to love you, this mortal dread has been upon me, turning my dearest joys into mournful spectres. I am continually haunted by images of unrevealed horror. When I part from you at night, I feel a dreary foreboding that the morning will find our separation final; and when I wake, I find my pillow wet with tears which I have shed during the brief season in which I sleep."

Imagining that their quiet and lonely life had something to do with the state of her nerves, Heinrich besought Madam Wisner to send for some dear friend of her daughter; and, accordingly, without Bertha's knowledge, she invited a young and lively schoolmate whom her daughter dearly loved, to make her a visit. Heinrich also requested his younger brother to come to him; feeling that his gaiety of heart might win Bertha from her sadness.

Wilhelm obeyed his summons, and Caroline Hartz arrived at the same time. During the day, the party made frequent excursions, and the change seemed beneficial to Bertha; but at night, when Heinrich went to his room and sat down to his books, Bertha sat at her window from which the busy student was visible; she watched the dark shadows in the quadrangular court, which even his bright light could not quite dispel, and fancied that foes were lurking near her beloved.

If it be true, as the Scottish seer declared, that "coming events cast their shadows before," we must pity and not condemn the loving little maiden; for, late one evening, when watching those dismal shadows made by the projecting wall, and magnifying their number to many more, she believed that she saw tangible forms and heard audible voices, belonging to human beings. It did not alarm her so much as had the phantoms of her own imagination; but still she was chained to the spot. Relying upon the obscurity in which she sat, she gently opened the lightly framed window, and heard some one say softly, "There, that is he! no doubt he is at his infernal incantations now. Let us surround this part of the house, and catch the wizard at his unhallowed work."

Benumbed with terror as she was, Bertha had yet presence of mind enough to leave her room, cross that of her mother, and tap at Heinrich's door. He opened it instantly, and she told her errand. Feeling that her old terrors had only reached a new point, he tried to induce her to return and attempt to sleep; but her fears now were so genuine, and so different to her ordinary ones, that he was more disposed to sympathize with her.

"Pray, pray extinguish your light, Heinrich!" she said, almost breathless with her emotion. "They will see your shadow on the ceiling. Come to my room, for God's sake. Mother, awake! Heinrich is in danger!" And, by snatches, she repeated what she had heard.

A rude battering at the house door convinced her auditors that this at least was not a phantom—and, notwithstanding her frantic appeal, Heinrich insisted on answering it in person. He descended, leaving her almost lifeless on the floor. By this time, his brother and Caroline Hartz were assembled in Heinrich's room, and, by their exertions, Bertha was restored. She persisted, after she recovered, in going down to her lover, and they watched her as she stole softly to the door where he was still parleying with the strangers, and stood by his side. He felt her gentle touch upon his arm, and said, "Bertha, darling, these men accuse me of—what do you think?—of Witchcraft. Would you believe that a quiet, orderly student like myself would be suspected of that?"

"Pardon me, young gentleman, it is those very studies that have sealed your doom. We have every reason to believe that your constant and protracted night studies have been with a view of obtaining a knowledge of the black art. Your known practices condemn you."

This was uttered by a respectable-looking man whom Heinrich remembered to have seen in the vicinity of the lawyers' offices, and whom he had supposed to be an officer of the courts. He was accompanied by several other individuals, of whom he seemed to be the delegated spokesman. Among them was one in the garb of a priest, who kept repeating Latin phrases, expressive of holy horror and unmitigated detestation of a wretch whom he denounced as the devil's own.

Heinrich, who really could not believe himself in danger, although aware that such things had been, still maintained his stand with Bertha leaning on his arm, trembling with the force of her emotion. All the terrible forebodings which she had so long struggled with, seemed about to be realized.

Apparently divining the nature of the tie existing between the two, the individuals composing this strange party included Bertha in their denunciations. They demanded access to Heinrich's private room, which, with eyes flashing at their presumption, he refused; but on Wilhelm's representation that the unpretending nature of his studies, and the absence of all mystery in his apartment, might best convince them of their error, he determined to allow them to enter and preceded them with the lamp, accompanied by all the family who now appeared, fully attired.

A celestial globe and other astronomical apparatus, some drawings of Saturn and his rings, an old book on sorcery which Heinrich had found among several belonging to Madam Wisner's father, and had unfortunately transferred to his own room, constituted sufficient proof that the Black Art had, at least, one or two votaries in this room; and the convulsive clinging of Bertha to her lover convinced the party that Heinrich and Bertha were the guilty ones. They were hurried off amidst the shrieks of the mother and Caroline, while Wilhelm von Kepler vowed revenge upon those unprincipled scoundrels who disturbed honest people in their beds—not doubting that his brother would receive full justice with the morning light.

It is painful to record the sufferings of the devoted lovers at this period. They were denied an interview, even in the presence of their accusers. Their friends were not permitted to see them; so that the anguish of the mother, and the equal misery of the good von Keplers who were sent for immediately, cannot be described. A trial was pretended, but every circumstance was wrested into evidence of guilt. Before long, others were arrested, equally the victims of a terrible superstition; a superstition, in fact, which destroyed the lives of more than one hundred individuals in the space of two years in Wurtzburg alone; among whom were fourteen vicars, several counsellors, children, and the wife of a man distinguished for his large size, herself being the handsomest woman in Wurtzburg.

During Heinrich's imprisonment, he found means to communicate with Wilhelm by a note written with a nail upon a smooth pine stick. It was written in a cipher which only the brother's understood, and had been the amusement of their boyhood. The stick was thrown to Wilhelm from a window to the street where he had been watching for some sign from Heinrich; and the answer was given by an almost imperceptible gesture on the part of the brother.

The fatal Friday on which the accused must confess or die, approached. Friday seemed to be the day on which most of them confessed. The death trial was to be by fire. If any passed through that ordeal, unscorched, they were innocent—so said the judge. It was as fair a way as that which was decreed to be passed through by water, where the poor victim was sure to die, guilty or not. If he or she did not sink, it was witchcraft that prevented. Death was certain, either way.

Meantime, Bertha, the poor girl! who had died a thousand deaths from her terrible forebodings of evil, had settled down into a wonderful calm which was as mysterious as her former state. It was not insensibility—it was the composure of resignation. Her mother—there was the only pang. But aside from this, there was a serene happiness in the thought of dying with her beloved. The pain—the agony of such a death—for her accusers took good care to hold up its horrors before her—was dreadful perhaps to think of, in its intensity of suffering; but then it was brief; and if she could but look on Heinrich's face until she died, it would be sweet. Already her slender form was attenuated to almost death-like thinness. Her face, over which her soft, fair hair hung in damp, clinging curls, was white and pure as alabaster; her hands almost transparent in their whiteness, and her lips were pale as the lily; yet an ineffable sweetness and beauty were still hers, which might seem to have disarmed her enemies.

She wore the same white robe which she had on when taken from her home; and its very spotlessness, to which no stain had come, during that dreadful week, only convinced the superstitious people that she had some marvellous agency at work which kept it pure and white. She uttered a joyful cry when Heinrich was brought out and placed near her before the awful flames. They were the last of many who had been led forth. The crowd had become almost sated with horrors; and the most zealous among them began to grow weary of the horrid scene.

One man who had not been noticed before, seemed now to take an active part, and the rest fell back and allowed him to go on as he chose. Approaching near the fire, just as the prisoners were forced toward the flame, he scattered into it, unseen, while all eyes were turned upon the victims, something which caused a dense smoke to arise, stifling and blinding. In the confusion that ensued, they who held the prisoners forsook their hold. Heinrich and Bertha felt themselves grasped by invisible hands and borne away as with an irresistible force; and the smoke still continued to ascend in dense volumes between them and the crowd. When at length it cleared away, the victims were nowhere to be seen, but the general impression was that they had perished and their bodies had been destroyed; although there were some who persisted in declaring that the Evil One had appeared bodily, and rescued his followers after throwing brimstone upon the flames.

Wilhelm had not dared to act this part himself, as he so nearly resembled his brother; but a strong, active serving man, who had accompanied the von Keplers to Wurtzburg, had readily undertaken to procure the material which Heinrich, in his note, had recommended to be used, and had fearlessly thrown it, at the exact moment upon the flames.

Long before the crowd dispersed, a carriage and four passed unquestioned through the gates of Wurtzburg, and within its curtained hiding-place, Heinrich was holding in his arms the death-like figure of Bertha and their brave deliverer was seated beside them. Homeward bound! To the beloved home of his childhood, Heinrich.

was bearing his half-dead bride. The rest of the relatives did not dare to join them, lest their sudden disappearance from Wurtzburg might awaken suspicion; but one day, at broad noon, the elder von Kepler and his wife, with Wilhelm and Bertha's mother, all dressed in deep mourning, as if for the loss of their nearest and dearest, were conveyed out of the city. They who had almost doubted, were now convinced that the friends, at least, believed them dead. "Even-handed justice" was appeased, and the pious detectors of witchcraft thought they had really done God service in ridding the world of such beings.

One more journey did Wilhelm von Kepler make to Wurtzburg; but this also was in secret, for he had learned to dread a place where wrong and error were baptized by different names; and this time, he returned, accompanied by Caroline Hartz, on a visit to Bertha, who was now restored to health and happiness—the beloved wife of Heinrich. From this visit, she did not return; nor indeed did either of the von Keplers ever again visit a scene fraught with such fearful recollections, and Caroline was an orphan, without ties to recall her to Wurtzburg. The want of relationship was however fully supplied, not long after, by her marriage with Wilhelm von Kepler.

Unclouded happiness is not to be expected in this life; but it seemed as if the rule was suspended in the case of the two escaped prisoners; for they lived to a green old age, surrounded by children and children's children, to whom the story of the trial by fire was often repeated. Old Hauptner, their deliverer, who had actually risked his own life in the uncertain hope of saving theirs, was an honored inmate of their home; regarding Heinrich and his wife with a species of adoration. Indeed, he attributed their deliverance, not so much to his own skill and activity in raising so powerful an agent, as to the angelic nature of Bertha who had, as he declared, passed through the ordeal of fire without the smell of the flame upon her white robes.

Toward the close of the seventeenth century, the world began to cease from degrading itself by these foolish and wicked superstitions; yet solitary instances crept into being, even amidst the enlightenment of the eighteenth. Previous to the eighteenth, the number of victims, from the date of Pope Innocent's bull, exceeds one hundred thousand! And this in Germany alone. In Switzerland, a witch was burnt in the latter part of the last century—less, indeed, than seventy-five years ago. And these murders were sanctioned by learned judges and even ministers professing the doctrines of the blessed Saviour!

BIANCA:

— OR, —

THREE NIGHTS IN PARIS.

BY WILTON B. REYNOLDS.

"BAH! the very name of this upstart makes the blood in my veins boil. And yet he, with his mean tribe daily walk the halls which kings have trod."

"Know you not, good Antoine, that this very day, the office of consul has been conferred upon Napoleon for life, and that he has the privilege of naming his successor?"

"Parbleu! Do I know what all Paris knows? Consul for life! Pierre, what if his life should be a short one?"

"Ha! I know what you mean, Antoine. But remember, your own life would last but a moment longer. Besides, it is not possible for you to approach him; he keeps a wary lookout on all sides with those restless eyes of his. He is no common man, Antoine, and he who rids France of him, does a noble deed."

"True, Pierre, it must be done, and yet not with steel. Let us take Bianca into our counsels. I have noticed that she schemes readily when others despair. These Italians are as quick to conspire, as the French are to fight."

"Can she be trusted?" asked the other, thoughtfully.

"I will answer for her with my life," was the ready reply.

As he spoke, he touched a small silver bell, which gave forth a sweet, musical sound.

The apartment in which the disguised royalists thus took counsel, was a moderately sized one, but handsomely furnished. Much which it contained was rare and quaintly carved, betraying former gentility. The occupants were men in the prime of life, both Frenchmen, but differing much in manner and appearance. The eldest, the one who had been called Antoine, was dark, restless, keen-eyed, bearing in his face the marks of an impatient, haughty spirit, which would not brook aught of insult, and which would work out its own ends against all obstacles. The other, Pierre, was younger, fairer, more carefully dressed than his companion, but with less of character expressed in his face.

Scarcely had the last tinkle of the bell died away, when the curtain at the further end of the apartment was pushed aside, and a woman advanced slowly towards the occupants of the room. She might have been thirty, and yet she scarcely looked that age, so tall and superbly formed was she. Hair of midnight blackness was carelessly yet gracefully disposed about her head, and her eyes, of the same hue, shot forth quick, impatient glances, which clearly betrayed her Italian origin.

"Bianca," spoke Pierre, "Antoine and I were holding an important conference, and we desired your aid, knowing that you could be trusted."

"Truly I shall be glad to serve you," responded the girl; "but you must tell me how I am to do so."

Pierre looked towards Antoine.

"The truth is," said Antoine, thus appealed to, "there is a man in Paris, whom it is necessary to dispose of. I will not speak his name; you know whom I mean. We cannot approach him closely enough either to stab or shoot him, and we must therefore devise other means to destroy him. Give us your aid, and you shall be richly rewarded; betray us, and—"

A significant glance towards the weapon he wore, enforced the meaning of his last sentence. Bianca laughed lightly, carelessly dropping, as she did so, the corner of the window-curtain which she had been rolling up in her hand.

"Ah, my good Antoine," said she, "twice since you have been speaking, I have had it in my power to betray you, without so much as speaking a word. See you those men yonder?"

Neither Pierre nor Antoine needed a second invitation to glance from the window. Nothing was to be seen, however, but two individuals in plain citizen's dress, walking upon different sides of the street, and apparently unknown to each other.

"You are mistaken, Bianca," said Pierre, sinking back lazily into his seat, "those are but good dull citizens."

Antoine looked around with a frowning face. "She is right; they are the spies of Napoleon. But how do I know," continued he, turning suddenly to Bianca, "that you have not already betrayed us? A raised finger would be sufficient."

"Monsieur must take my word for it," replied Bianca, with flashing eyes.

"Pardon. Such times make all suspicious of their dearest friends. But exercise your ingenuity, Bianca, and plan some deadly instrument that shall bring destruction surely and speedily."

"Your command shall be obeyed," said Bianca, rising. "By to-morrow night, when the consul holds his levee, it shall be in your power, and that without risk to yourself, to destroy him and those about him."

"Thanks, Bianca. Your woman's wit is more valuable than all our clumsy ideas heaped together. Plan but this instrument of vengeance, and your future is made."

There was no reply to this, save a haughty bend of the head, as Bianca swept from the room.

Midnight had fallen upon the city. All Paris seemed slumbering quietly; but one who watched might see now and then a muffled figure stealing through the quiet streets, or a solitary light in some distant window, convincing proof that all did not repose tranquilly.

In a lofty but plainly furnished room, sat the First Consul, surrounded by a few of those men whose brave hearts and iron muscles had already done, and were still to do him good service, both in the cabinet and in the field.

In another part of the city, a far different scene was presented. Bianca the Italian sat communing with herself, scarcely heeding the passage of time. She had thrown herself upon a crimson-covered lounge, and with her hands pressed against her forehead, she plotted the destruction of him, who at that very moment was plotting the destruction of thousands in new and glorious campaigns. The striking of the hour of one by the city clocks roused Bianca from her reverie.

"Yes, he shall perish, he, and all his people, and I will be the instrument of their destruction. Why should I hesitate? Has he not crossed my path and made my life unhappy? And yet, none of my proud name have ever stooped to stain their hands with crime. Let me think."

Another hour passed, and again Bianca roused herself, and walked across the room with a determined face.

"I am resolved. The deed must be done. This man has made the grave of all my hopes through his mad ambition, and I will not scruple to end at once the career which opens upon him so brilliantly. I will rival those heroines of old, who, putting on armor, went forth to battle, and fought for the lands of their birth. I will immortalize my name, not by deeds of warfare, but by the invention of a machine which shall be speedy and sure in its operation. O yes, and it shall be called the infernal machine, for nothing more infernal has yet been conceived of, than that which the brain of Bianca Cortesi has this night planned!"

The black eyes flashed triumphantly, as she touched a bell by her side. It was answered by a young girl, whose heavy eyes betokened that she had been just awakened from a profound slumber.

"It is late, Annette; I will retire," said Bianca, without deigning to notice her attendant's weary appearance.

The girl proceeded to do her mistress's bidding, and then extinguishing the light, she stole softly from the apartment, and all the dwelling was in darkness.

'Twas evening again. The First Consul held a levee, and a gay crowd thronged the saloons. Many a one, since famous in history, walked those halls, little dreaming, perhaps, of the magnitude of those events which the future was to exhibit. The First Consul himself, whose aristocratic and dignified bearing made him appear a king, for whom the Tuilleries was a fitting place of abode, lingered now in conversation with some dark-browed minister, or chatted gaily with some brilliant beauty, or oftener perhaps, stood by the side of his wife, the amiable Josephine.

His sisters Pauline and Elise, his step-children Eugene and Hortense Beauharnais, were likewise well calculated to adorn the court of Napoleon, inasmuch as they were all distinguished for beauty and amiability. The brave and gallant Ney, whose fate has been so often deplored, Soult, Murat, Bernadotte and the crafty Fouché, all were there, all of whom were destined to be immortalized with Napoleon. Madame Bonaparte occupied a small saloon at the end of the magnificent suite of apartments, and was surrounded by ladies, among whom Madame de Stael was conspicuous. Napoleon had suffered himself to be drawn out from the throng by the wily Fouché who had some scheme to communicate. The attention of the First Consul, however, was suddenly attracted towards the small saloon, where a slight commotion exhibited itself. The ladies in that vicinity seemed to be crowding about some object, and conversation appeared to have ceased.

For a few moments Napoleon watched the scene, and then, followed by Fouché, he walked slowly towards the small saloon.

"Ah, monsieur," said Madame Bonaparte, as she saw him approaching, "you are the fortunate owner of this mysterious box. These ladies will have it, it should belong to me instead of you."

Napoleon moved forward another step and examined the object which had attracted so much curiosity. It was an oblong box made of rose-wood, and richly inlaid, bearing the inscription:

"To Napoleon Bonaparte, the First Consul."

"How came this to be brought here at this hour?" asked Napoleon.

"I hardly know," answered Josephine. "As far as I could comprehend the matter, the donor seemed to have made it a condition that it should be presented to you at this time."

"Ha!" uttered the consul, taking in with a glance of his eagle eye the face of every person in the room. "Who brought it?" again demanded he.

The question passed from lip to lip, but no satisfactory answer was obtained. It had made its appearance very mysteriously, and that was all that could be ascertained. With characteristic promptness, Napoleon was proceeding to fathom the mystery by opening the box, when Fouché restrained him.

"Let me beg of you, sire, not to endanger your life by opening what after all may be a snare, set by your enemies for your speedy destruction."

Napoleon paused with his hand upon the lid. It was a critical moment, but after a little thought, he turned away, simply saying:

"You may be right, after all, Fouché. My life is much too precious to be bartered away to satisfy an idle curiosity. Remove the box, and dispose of it as you will; you have had long experience in such matters."

He turned away carelessly, and entered again into conversation, entirely forgetful in a few moments of the mysterious affair of the box. Not so Madame Bonaparte. Her eye had lost all its brilliancy, and her cheek had faded at the mere mention of danger. The attempts to assassinate Napoleon had already been too frequent, and what woman ever regards such a matter lightly?

At that very moment, Bianca Cortesi paced with clasped hands her apartment.

"Aha! the hour is past, and he and his wretched minions no longer cumber the earth. He has gone elsewhere with his mad plottings. Strange, that I should still have a spark of compassion for him who so ruthlessly sacrificed the lives of my nearest kindred, and made me an outcast from the land of my birth. And yet, now and then a strange pity crosses me—pity for that master-mind, for that glorious intellect which men so worship."

A quick, impatient knock at the door startled her.

"Come in," was the response.

It was Antoine, looking flushed and weary.

"Bianca, the scheme has failed, and we have but lost our labor. Napoleon has not opened the box, nor will he, for it is in the hands of Fouché."

"And what of that?" asked Bianca. "Are you so easily discouraged?" And she surveyed him with flashing eyes.

"Easily! Bianca, you drive me mad! Tell me, what charm does the man wear, that out of every danger he should come unharmed?"

"'Tis simply instinct, Antoine. But do not despair. To-morrow it shall be so arranged that not even instinct shall preserve him."

"Thanks, Bianca. You are ever quick-witted, but if suspicion once falls upon us, we can call no day to-morrow. Let me know your plans to-night, and they shall be put into execution immediately."

"Peace!" said Bianca, sternly; "I will work my own way, or not at all. Rest you calmly, good Antoine, for this one night, and to-morrow your dearest wish shall be realized."

"As you will, Bianca. I know you are to be trusted." And Antoine bowed himself out of the room.

"Ay," muttered he, as he stumbled down the stairs, "to be trusted whilst my eye is on you, and my good weapon hangs over you. No further, Bianca, will I trust you, or any other woman."

Another night fell upon Paris, a night long to be remembered, and whose events it was destined that history should record. It was a clear, frosty, delightful evening, and not so cold but that a brisk walk through the gay streets could be highly enjoyed. There were, however, but few Parisians out, and the bright stars shone down on streets almost deserted. One thoroughfare, however, must be excepted. Upon the sidewalk of one of the most noted streets was collected a little crowd of people, a quiet assembly, who talked in low tones, and nearly all of whom appeared to be listening attentively for some expected sound. At length a low, rumbling noise, proceeding from some distant street, fell upon the ears of those who listened.

"He comes! he comes!" muttered a man, over whom a long cloak fell like a shroud.

"Who comes?" asked another, who stood by the side of the first speaker.

"The First Consul, on his way to the opera-house," was the reply. A moment after, he added: "Tis a cold night, citizen;" having said which, he sauntered carelessly away from the other's vicinity.

In the meantime, Bianca Cortesi was waiting with some anxiety to hear of the consummation of her work.

"It cannot possibly fail now," she murmured, as, arrayed in a garb that would defy observation, she stole down the stairs and stood outside the door which opened into the street.

"After all, it will not bring back to me Fiesco, who was killed in that cruel battle." And as the remembrance of her loss came upon her so forcibly, she leaned against the doorpost, whilst a few genuine tears found their way down her cheeks. In a brief space, however, they were dashed aside. "No, I will not mourn," she murmured, "not at least while the man who lured him on to death still lives. But I hear no sound, not even a murmur, and I am growing impatient. Antoine assured me that the work would be speedily done; but now I think it grows late. I will walk a few steps, and perchance I shall hear something"

A step started her just as she emerged from her hiding-place. She shrank back, but not before she had noted the tall figure of a man, who glanced at her curiously as he passed. Proceeding a few steps, he paused, and then slowly retraced his way. As he re-passed Bianca, the moonlight distinctly revealed each face, and there was a simultaneous cry:

"Fiesco!"

"Bianca!"

With a trembling hand, Bianca drew him up the narrow stairway, before daring to utter another word. Having gained a secure retreat, she looked at him long and earnestly.

"Where have you come from, Fiesco?"

"I have been wounded, Bianca—laying for months in a miserable hovel in Italy. Did the report that I was dead reach you?"

"Alas, Fiesco, it is many months since I began to mourn for you—months since I swore to take vengeance on Napoleon Bonaparte the First Consul."

"Hush, Bianca, not a word of him. Blame him not for what has happened. I love him—I idolize him. Whoever does him injury makes a deadly enemy of me."

Bianca grew pale, and began hastily to throw on the cloak of which she had just divested herself.

"Where are you going, Bianca? It is too late for you to venture out."

"Too late!—O no, do not say so. Perhaps the mischief is not yet done. Come, we will hurry, Fiesco."

"I do not understand you, Bianca. What mischief do you mean, and how are we to stop it?"

"The First Consul is to be assassinated to-night," whispered Bianca. "Come, Fiesco, it may not be too late."

Fiesco needed no second summons. He sprang down the stairs, followed by Bianca, and the two hastened up the street. As they neared the thoroughfare already mentioned, a murmur reached their ears.

"Bianca," said Fiesco, sternly, clutching her arm till she cried with pain, "is this your work? Have you dared plot against his life?"

"For your sake, I have," said Bianca, firmly.

"Then woe be to you," returned Fiesco.

They were suddenly involved in a crowd, a quiet crowd, with every face turned in one direction. Every man in it was awaiting the approach of the First Consul's carriage, which was now near at hand. Bianca sought frantically for Antoine, but he was nowhere to be seen. The carriage had now arrived directly opposite the crowd, and in the clear moonlight, Bianca saw the arm of a man raised, as if in the act of throwing. Darting forward, she seized the arm, but it was too late. The infernal machine, composed of gunpowder, bullets and inflammable materials, had been thrown among the people, and not into the carriage of Napoleon, as had been intended. The aim of Antoine had been destroyed by Bianca's grasp. A terrific explosion succeeded. Napoleon, who had observed, as the carriage neared this particular street, that a crowd had collected, having become suspicious from experience, had ordered his coachman to drive as rapidly as possible. It is owing to this circumstance that his life was preserved. As it was, many people were killed, and a number of houses were destroyed. The inventors of this atrocious machine perished by it. Had they lived, they would have been held in abhorrence, probably, even by the royalists.

Fiesco the Italian escaped, and a devoted admirer of Napoleon, followed his fortunes, until the latter was banished to St. Helena, when Fiesco returned to Italy and there died. Thus ended the tragedy of the twenty-fourth of December, 1800.

THE OLDEST MAN.

The editor of the Cincinnati Times, while on a jaunt, recently, had his attention called to a venerable person, who, it was alleged, was probably the oldest man in the United States. His name is Solomon Pangborn, who says he was born in the city of New York, then a small town of five or six hundred houses, in 1725. He is consequently 135 years old. Shortly after his birth, his father purchased a farm on the Mohawk River, not far from Fort Johnson, whither he removed. The old gentleman resides at Rising Sun, Indiana, where he has relatives in comfortable circumstances. He complains that for the last year or two his health has been much impaired, and that he is so old, medicine fails to improve his condition as it might in a younger person. He is perfectly resigned to live as long as God will permit him, but says that he would have met the fate common to mortality with a similar resignation many years ago. His sense of sight, as well as that of hearing, is much impaired, and he moves about with difficulty, although he still contrives to help himself, and uses neither crutch nor cane.

PURITY.

A spirit pure as hers
Is always pure, even while it errs:
As sunshine broken in the rill,
Though turned aside, is sunshine still.—MOORE.

THE DIVER'S TRADE.

Of all the employments by which men get a living, it always struck us that that of a diver was the most dismal and gloomy. What sights meet his gaze, as he gropes about in the darkling green twilight of the hostile element in which he hazards his life! An able writer says: "When the vessel has settled down in a sandy bottom, it is preserved for many months from breaking up, and its position would be much the same as it would be when floating in calm water, if it be not lifted over by under-current drifts. The light, of course, depends upon the depth and nature of the bottom; but when there is no chalk to give a milky thickness to the water, the diver pursues his work in a kind of gloomy twilight. By the aid of this, he can see and feel his way round the ship; but when he ascends the deck and then winds his way down into the principal cabin, he finds it pitch dark, and has nothing to guide him but his hands. This is the most difficult, and yet the most frequent labor he has to encounter—the danger being that, in a large vessel, where the cabin stairs are deep, and the cabins are long and broad, he might get his air-tube twisted round some unfamiliar projection, and squeeze off his supply of life from above. In opposition such as this he requires all his nerve and self-possession, all his power of feeling his way back in the exact road that he came.

"He may have got the precious casket, to which he has been directed, in his arms—but what of that, if he die before he can find the stairs? The cold, helpless masses that bump against his helmet, as they float along the lower roof over his head, are the decomposed corpses of those who were huddled together when the ship went down. A few of these may be on the floor under his feet, but only when pinned down by an overturned table or fallen chest. Their tendency is ever upward, and the remorseless sea washes away the dead infant from its mother's arms, the dead wife from the dead husband's embrace. If the wreck be in the channel, the small crabs are always beginning to fatten on their prey. The diver disentangles himself from this silent crowd, and ascends the silent stairs to the deck. The treasure he has rescued is hauled up into the attendant diving boat, and he returns again to renew his work. He seldom meets with an accident under the water—never, perhaps, with death; and the chief risk he runs is from getting some heavy piece of ship-lumber overturned on his long train of air-pipe. Even in this he feels the sudden check and the want of air, gropes his way back to the obstruction, removes it, signals to his companions to be raised, and reaches the boat exhausted and alarmed, but not so much as to give up his place in the trade. His earnings mostly take the form of shares in what he recovers. If fortunate, his gains may be large—if unfortunate, they may be small; but no man can grudge him the highest prizes it is possible for him to win."

Fine sensibilities are like woodpines, delightful luxuries of beauty, to twine around a solid, upright stem of understanding; but very poor things if, unsustained by strength, they are left to creep along the ground.

KING AND PEASANT.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

Our home is a vine-wreathed cottage,
 Our life a sunshiny walk—
 Of toil at morning and nooning,
 Of rest at the twilight talk.
 We have neither gold nor silver
 To store in secret hoard;
 We've not a rare or costly thing,
 To garnish our humble board;
 Yet we're the merriest, happiest twain
 In all old Barleyford.

The king rides by in his chariot,
 His pages clad in blue;
 The glittering pomp of the cortege
 Is a pleasant thing to view.
 The ladies nod their coronets,
 And smile with a haughty scorn,
 As out to the hunt in the morning
 They go while the dew's on the thorn;
 But I'd not exchange my life-let
 With that of the noblest born.

What reck we, love, of the flashes
 That fall from lamps of gold,
 Hung over the palace glories
 With gorgeous splendor cold?
 What value to us the wine stream
 Brimming red o'er the silver cup?
 We've the lamps of heaven to look upon,
 That our Father's hand set up!
 And the crystal water of God's own love
 When we break our bread to sup!

The king and his jewelled ladies
 Hear mass in a chapel grand,
 Draperied with silk and damask
 From many a rare old land.
 We kneel in the vast cathedral,
 Whose dome is the blue-arched skies;
 And the soft mosaic 'neath our feet
 Is made of violets' eyes;
 And the thunder's the mighty organ voice
 That swells in the symphonies!

The king is lord of the country,
 His will the law of the land;
 Cities rise and fall at his pleasure,
 And life goes out at his hand!
 But we have a nobler empire,
 We rule with a mightier sway;
 We've the rich, ripe, burning bliss-world
 Of love all the blessed way—
 The Eden home of life's glory,
 Love's rainbow-garlanded day!

The king may joy in his greatness,
 Rejoice in his banquet feast;
 Our love is grand as the splendor
 That breaks o'er the drowsy east!
 We have Godward hopes to cheer us,
 High yearning dreams divine!
 We yield up our lives' rich fullness
 On the altar of love's dear shrine;
 If there's peace in this world of beauty,
 It dwells in my heart and thine!

THE LOST BRACELET.

BY MRS. S. E. DAWES.

"Do you really mean what you say, Miss Helen? Are you going to apply for the situation of a seamstress?"

Yes, Susan, I have thought the matter all over, and have come to the conclusion that it is the best thing I can do for the present. You have been kind to give me a home so long, and I have been very happy under the comfortable roof of my old nurse, but I cannot remain here a burden upon you any longer."

"Pray don't talk so, Miss Helen! I haven't considered it a burden at all, to provide for you in your need. It has done my old eyes good to look upon you every day, and think how I used to carry you in my arms, and take the whole care of you, when your father lived in the great house yonder. Ah, Miss Helen, those were happy days for us all! and your sweet mother—God bless her!—how she used to fill the house with sunshine! What would she say, if she knew her only child was thinking of going out into the world to earn her living?"

"Could I now hear her voice from among the angel band, methinks she would bid me shrink from no honest employment whereby I could gain a support."

"Ah well, Miss Helen, I suppose you know best! But it grieves me to the heart, to have you leave me for a life of toil. If you would accept of it, my humble home shall be your shelter as long as it is in my possession."

"Thank you, Susan! I feel grateful, in my utter loneliness, that one heart regards me with so much affection. I think, in my present circumstances, I shall feel happier to gain a more independent living. But if I am sick, or in trouble, I shall come home to you, to pillow my head upon the faithful bosom where it has so often rested in my childhood."

When she had finished speaking, Helen Gardner, who during the above conversation had been preparing to go out, bade her old nurse a cheerful adieu, and went forth to answer an advertisement for a seamstress she had seen in the morning's paper. As the reader has become aware, her family were once in affluent circumstances; but her father having been successful in two or three instances, embarked in speculation still more largely, and after a few turns of Fortune's wheel, found himself forsaken by the fickle goddess, and his splendid fortune almost a perfect wreck. His misfortunes preyed upon his mind and impaired his health, and ere long he was numbered among the victims of consumption. A very small sum was left, for the support of his wife and Helen; but the former becoming, soon after his death, a confirmed invalid, was obliged to draw upon the principal of her little property, to get herself the comforts which she needed. As she became weaker both in body and mind, Helen had the management of their limited means; and by strict economy, and most heroic self-denial, she managed to make it last until her mother was beyond the reach of earthly suffering. Her old nurse Susan insisted upon taking her home with her, and having really no other shelter, she accepted the generous offer with a grateful heart.

Helen soon reached the house she was in search of, and found it a palatial residence in one of the most fashionable parts of the city. She had once been received at such mansions as a visitor; and as she ascended the steps, the sudden thought of the errand that had brought her there, made her grow sick at heart. But resolutely forcing back all the old memories, she gained strength to ring the bell, and was shown into the presence of Mrs. Hastings, the mistress of the house, and her daughter Isabel. Both ladies were elegantly attired, but there was a certain hauteur in their manner which struck Helen very unpleasantly. There was another inmate of the room, a young man of handsome appearance, but in whose dark, piercing eye lurked so much of evil, that Helen involuntarily shuddered as she felt his gaze fastened upon her. Mrs. Hastings expressed herself satisfied with her appearance and abilities, and so Helen engaged to enter upon her duties the next morning.

"You have hired a splendid-looking girl there, mother," said Edward Hastings, as Helen departed. "Pray don't be offended, Miss Isabel, but in my opinion she looks and acts the lady quite as much as yourself. I shall take care to form an early acquaintance with her."

"I don't care to have you form the acquaintance of any servant whom I hire into the house. If you regard my wishes in the least, you will have nothing to do with the seamstress I have just hired," replied Mrs. Hastings; while Isabel, indignant at that part of the remark which applied to her, with a scornful curl of the lip resumed her novel.

Helen, in spite of all her attempts at cheerfulness, entered her new home with a sad heart, for an indefinite foreboding of evil in store for her seemed to haunt her. A small sitting-room was appropriated to her use, while sewing; and for the first few days, as no fault was found with her work, and she was left a great part of the time to herself, she began to think that she should like her situation, after all, very much better than she expected. She occasionally met the owner of the dark eyes, but as he always addressed some civil remark to her and passed on, she thought perhaps she had at first formed too hasty a judgment of his character.

One evening, after the rest of the family had gone to some place of amusement, Edward entered the sitting-room with a book.

"By some chance," he remarked, upon entering, "the fires down stairs have been allowed to get very low, and as it is quite cosy and warm here, I will read here awhile, with your permission."

Helen merely bowed assent, and handing him a chair, quietly resumed her work. Her visitor for some time seemed entirely absorbed in his book; then closing it, he gradually drew her into conversation, and made himself so agreeable that when Helen sought her pillow that evening, she found herself wondering how she could have formed so unfavorable an opinion of Edward Hastings upon their first meeting.

He saw with great satisfaction the favorable impression he had made, and muttered to himself, as he retired:

"She's a prize worth having, and no mistake, and will make a fine addition to my already numerous conquests."

From this time forth, he embraced every opportunity to be in the society of Helen, using all his arts to captivate her, and if possible, to win her love. She did not stop to analyze her feelings towards him—she only knew that she had come to look forward to his visits, now and then, to the little sitting-room, with more pleasure, perhaps, than she would care to own.

Helen managed to suit Mrs. Hastings and her daughter in her work, and although sometimes stung to the quick by their haughty, overbearing manner towards her, yet she toiled bravely on, occasionally seeking the ready sympathy of her old nurse Susan, in whose humble home she was always sure of a welcome. The months sped on, and at length one afternoon, in the absence of the rest of the family, Edward sought her presence, and emboldened by the flush of pleasure that suffused her face, as he drew a chair close to her side, he poured into her ear the story of his love, and asked her to become his own. He urged his suit with all the eloquence he was master of, and Helen at length replied:

"There is one barrier to our union, which I think would be insurmountable; and that is, the pride of your family. They treat me now in every respect as a menial, entirely beneath them in standing; and as your wife, I could not reasonably expect they would show me that respect which in that relation I should feel was my due.

"Excuse me, darling, but I think you have quite misunderstood my intentions. I asked you to become my own, and that you can do, without the services of a clergyman. You are leading a life of toil here, and hiding your glorious beauty in seclusion; but comply with my wishes, and splendidly-furnished apartments, elegant dresses, and a life of ease awaits you. Leaving your situation here upon some pretence, I will install you in a palace home, and my family never need know of this alliance."

During this villanous speech, Helen grew deadly pale; but summoning all her pride to her aid, she rose and confronted him with all the dignity of exalted virtue.

"You are right, sir—I have misunderstood your intentions; and as I never will comply with your base proposals, you will oblige me by leaving my presence instantly."

"Softly, my sweet one! you will think better of this by-and-by. I do not regret I have raised this little tempest of passion, for believe me—you look superbly now, with that erect form and flashing eye."

"Your insults are insufferable, and once for all, I assure you my decision is unalterable. I would rather live in the most humble apartment, and in the direst poverty, than in splendor with you, even though you saw fit to give me the name of wife. I have no words to express the utter loathing and contempt with which I regard you, and as you do not seem inclined to leave my presence, I shall leave yours."

"Stay, Helen Gardner—you shall hear this before you go! I am not wont to be thwarted in my plans, nor addressed in so haughty language, by a poor sewing-girl. You shall rue the day you dared to defy me, and mark my words! I will yet have a sweet revenge for all this."

"As you please, sir! But remember—whatever you do, there is a just God who rules all events, and who is the especial protector of the orphan."

Helen sought her chamber, and now that there was no longer any necessity for appearing calm, she sank into a chair and gave way to a violent burst of tears. But amid all her grief, she was deeply thankful that the true character of the man she had begun to regard with too much interest had thus early been revealed to her. She could not remain in the house where he was any longer, and rousing herself to action, she employed herself, the rest of the afternoon, in packing her trunk for her departure.

Early in the evening, the family returned from their ride, as Miss Isabel was going to a grand party. Helen, leaving her bonnet and shawl in the hall, rapped upon the parlor door, and requested to see Mrs. Hastings. That lady being busy just then, and seeing who it was, bade her enter, as she could as well hear what she had to say there, as to leave the room. Helen turned a shade paler at this summons, but nothing daunted, she entered the room. A gentleman who had been a frequent caller there of late, was sitting conversing with Isabel, and Edward was sitting at one of the windows apparently engaged in reading one of the evening papers. Advancing toward Mrs. Hastings, she said in a low tone:

"I have come to inform you, madam, that I cannot remain in your service any longer. I have made arrangements to leave to-night."

Mrs. Hastings replied in a voice so loud as to cause all eyes to be turned towards her:

"Upon my word, this is a cool transaction—to leave me without an hour's warning, and so much work as you will leave unfinished besides! I always require my servants to give me a week's warning of their intention of leaving."

"I know that is customary, but circumstances alter cases, and I have ample reason for leaving thus abruptly."

"Will you please state that reason? for certainly that is the least satisfaction you can give me."

"I know it, madam; but for all that, you must excuse me, if I decline to comply with your reasonable request."

"Let her go, and don't make any more words with her!" passionately exclaimed Isabel, from the other side of the room. "I heard of a capital seamstress this morning, and I think, mother, we shall gain, rather than lose, by the change."

"Very well, if I can obtain another in your place immediately, I must say I do not regret your leaving, for you have put on a great many unbecoming airs for a servant."

During this conversation, Edward left the room, and returned just as his mother finished speaking. He brushed rudely past Helen, so that one of his coat buttons caught in her dress, and he stopped at her side a moment to remove it. She caught one glimpse of his basilisk eyes, and a cold shudder passed over her, and she was glad to escape from the room. An hour after, she was sobbing out her trouble, as she had promised to do, on the faithful bosom of the only true friend she possessed—her old nurse Susan.

Mr. Somers, the gentleman who was making a call upon Isabel, soon took his departure, and that young lady immediately began to make preparations for the party. About an hour after, she rushed wildly into the room, exclaiming:

"Mother, have you seen anything of my new pearl bracelet? for it is gone out of my casket."

"No, I have not been in your room to-day. How long since you have missed it?"

"It was there when I returned from our ride, for I saw it, and thought what an appropriate ornament it would be to wear with this pearl-colored satin."

"Then it must have been stolen, that is certain. Now the question is—who is the thief?"

"Not a very knotty question to solve, I should think," cried Edward. "The abrupt departure of your lady seamstress, and the loss of your bracelet, are rather suspicious coincidences."

"Sure enough, my son. I have no doubt she is the thief, and you must go instantly and get an officer to search her and her trunk."

"That I can do, but perhaps the bird may have flown many miles from here ere this."

"The artful hussy!" said Isabel, as Edward departed on his errand; "who knows but what her trunk is filled with stolen articles? I warrant we shall miss a score of things."

"I have no doubt of it, and I am so impatient to hear the result of the search, I can scarcely wait."

The tears had scarcely dried upon Helen's cheeks, after relating her story to Susan, ere the door opened and a police officer entered the room, accompanied by a woman.

"Is that young girl sitting there named Helen Gardner?" said the officer, addressing Susan.

"That is my name," said Helen, answering him herself. "Have you any business with me?"

"I have, and I am sorry it is of so unpleasant a nature. A pearl bracelet, of great value, has been missed from the house you have just left, and I have come to search you and your trunk, to see if you have it in your possession. I will search your dress pocket myself, and if necessary, this woman will search your person. I assure you it is very unpleasant business, but as an officer of the law, I must do my duty."

"You can proceed in your search," said Helen, through her white lips, "but it will be useless, for I am not a thief, sir."

"I am sorry your words are so soon proved false," said the officer, as he drew the lost bracelet from her pocket and held it up to her horrified gaze. "How came this here, if you did not take it?"

Helen, although deadly pale, looked the officer steadily in the face, as she replied:

"I know not, sir. I am as ignorant as you are how it came there. I have never seen the bracelet before, except upon the arm of Miss Hastings. I assure you, sir, before Heaven, I am innocent of this crime."

"I believe you speak the truth, miss, but still, as the article was found on your person, I must arrest you for theft. I hope at your trial you will be able to furnish some proof of your innocence."

"O, my poor, poor Helen—have you got to be dragged off to jail?" sobbed Susan, who till now had stood almost petrified with horror. "O don't, sir—don't take her away to jail! She's as innocent as a babe unborn—it's some dreadful plot against her! Don't take her away, I beg of you!"

"Be calm, Susan," said Helen, soothingly. "I am not afraid of a prison, and conscious of my innocence, it will in the end be no disgrace. It looks dark before me now, but there may be a silver lining to the cloud."

Arranging herself in the bonnet and shawl she had not put away since her arrival, she told the officer she was ready, and amid the sobs of Susan, she took her departure, and soon found herself in one of the cells of the jail. As the bolt was drawn which fastened her in, she began to realize that she was indeed a prisoner, and sinking upon the floor, all the fortitude that had sustained her through her arrest gave way, and she lay a long time in a stupor of grief. At length, becoming more calm, she had the courage to look the perils of her situation in the face, and then came the blessed thought that there was one ear ever open to the cry of those who put their trust in Him. Kneeling upon the stone floor, she prayed fervently that in her extreme need God would be her support, and cause light to come out of all this darkness. As she rose, a sweet peace entered her soul, and she was soon calmly sleeping upon her prison couch.

The next morning the jailor's wife, a kind, benevolent-looking woman, entered the cell, and bid her a cheerful "good morning."

"The officer who brought you here last evening," she said, "commended you to my sympathy, believing, he said, that you were innocent of the crime laid to your charge. If you would like writing materials, and a few books to while away the time, I will furnish you with them with pleasure, for your trial will not take place for a number of days."

"Thank you, it would confer a great favor upon me if you would do so. I was thinking how I should get through the long days here, with nothing to employ me, just before you came in."

The woman left the cell, and soon a writing-table, with books and stationary and a small chair, made their appearance. Helen arranged them in as favorable a position as possible, and as the morning sun streamed through the grated window, her prison home wore quite a cheerful appearance.

As she sat reading one of her books, a few days after, she was startled by the unbolting of her cell door by the jailor, who ushered in Mr. Edward Hastings. She started to her feet, and her eyes flashed, as she addressed him:

"How dare you seek my presence again, after what has passed between us?"

"Come, Helen, don't be in such a passion, if it does enhance your beauty! I have come as a friend, to relieve you from the unpleasant position you are in."

"Deliver me from such friends! I have no need of any service you can render me."

"I don't know about that! I think liberty would be as sweet to you as to any one else, and by simply accepting the offer I made you once before, and one which many a fair one would be glad of receiving, you can not only be restored to freedom, but live a life of splendid ease."

"Never, sir! I would rather these prison walls would enclose me forever."

"Have you reflected what will be the probable result of your trial? My sister's bracelet was found in your pocket, and you cannot prove you did not put it there. You will no doubt be found guilty, and have to suffer the penalty of the law. How can you ever expect, afterward, to get another situation?—for people are generally pretty cautious how they employ one who has been branded as a thief."

"I have viewed my situation in its worst light, and calmly await my trial. I did not take your sister's bracelet, and who put it into my pocket, I may never know; but that it was done by some one who wished to ruin me, I have not the slightest doubt. I would a thousand times rather be in my position than theirs, for I shall only be summoned before an earthly tribunal, while they will one day have to answer for the deed at the bar of Heaven. As your offer of friendship is entirely unappreciated by me, I will thank you to leave me."

"You are a strange specimen of womankind, to prefer this prison, and subsequent disgrace and toil, to the life I have offered you!"

"Then you must have associated with the most degraded of our sex; for no woman who has the slightest regard for her honor, would listen to such base proposals. I have nothing further to say to you, and you will oblige me by never seeking another interview with me, for you can never number me among your victims."

"Perhaps not; but I shall have my revenge, as I said before. Farewell, sweet Helen! I wish you a pleasant time at your approaching trial. I shall be there to get one more glimpse of your regal form, ere it is robed in a convict's garb."

The day of the trial at length arrived, and Helen, in her mourning garments, pale and dignified, took her seat calmly in the prisoner's box. The faithful Susan sat as near to her as she was allowed, and the trial commenced.

Miss Isabel Hastings was the first witness, and testified to having seen the bracelet in her casket just before the tea-bell rang, and having missed it soon after the prisoner left the house. A servant girl also testified that on the afternoon of the day it was stolen, she saw it lying in the casket, as she was dusting the dressing-table.

Mrs. Hastings testified that she left the house in a great hurry, and absolutely refused to give any reason for so doing. And that the prisoner looked very pale, and appeared much agitated, as she was telling her that she intended leaving that night. The officer who arrested her testified to having found the bracelet in the pocket of the prisoner, and the counsel for the plaintiff, in a short plea, confirmed in the minds of nearly all present the guilt of the fair girl at the bar.

At this juncture of affairs, a man came pressing through the crowd, and wiping the perspiration from his brow, advanced to the bar and spoke a few words to the counsel whom the government had furnished for the prisoner. He informed the court that an important witness had just arrived, who could testify in behalf of the defendant; and accordingly Mr. Ernest Somers, much to the astonishment of Isabel Hastings, was put upon the stand.

In a clear voice, he said: "I was present in the room when Miss Gardner came to tell Mrs. Hastings she was about to leave. During their conversation, Mr. Edward Hastings left the room, and on his return brushed very rudely past Miss Gardner, and some portion of his clothing caught in her dress. They were standing beneath the chandelier, and as he was detaching his coat button, or whatever caught her dress, I distinctly saw him drop a bracelet in her pocket. I first had suspicions of foul play, but afterwards thought there might be a secret attachment between them, and he wished to make her in this way a parting present. I dismissed the circumstance from my mind, until I heard that Miss Gardner had been put upon trial for the theft of the bracelet, and I have hurried here to give in my testimony, to save an innocent girl from becoming a victim to as foul a plot as ever was conceived."

Her counsel, after this testimony, made an eloquent plea in her behalf, and without leaving their seats, Helen was pronounced "not guilty!" by the jury. Edward Hastings and his mortified sister now left the court-room amid the jeers of the crowd, and their mother and her counsel followed. Tears of joy rolled down the wrinkled cheeks of Susan, as she grasped the hand of Helen, who stood almost stupefied at what she had just heard and the unlooked-for proof of her innocence. She was roused by a manly voice at her side, who said kindly:

"Miss Gardner, allow me to conduct you from this place, for you are now free, and you must be weary from your late excitement."

"Thank you, sir, I gratefully accept of your escort, for as you have said, I am very tired."

Arrived at her house, the grateful Susan pressed Mr. Somers—for he it was who had accompanied them—to enter and rest himself, after their long walk. He had become strangely interested in the fair girl beside him, and he was very glad to accept of the invitation. As he gazed upon her face, he found his mind wandering back to the days of his boyhood, when a sweet, golden-haired little girl was his constant playmate, and at length he asked, abruptly:

"If I am not too inquisitive, may I ask, Miss Gardner, if you ever lived in Ashton?"

"My father's country residence used to be there, and it is there I have spent some of my happiest hours."

"Then we were old playmates in childhood. Do you not remember Ernest Somers?"

"I do. I could not easily forget my champion and protector in all my little school difficulties. I did not dream that in later years you would render such a signal service, as you have done this morning. From my inmost heart I thank you for taking the trouble to give the testimony which proved my innocence, and restored me to freedom."

"Say no more about that. It was only a simple act of justice, for which I deserve no thanks. My mother will be delighted that I have found you. She has often regretted that by our long residence out West, she had lost all trace of her early friend, for our mothers, too, were schoolmates. We have purchased the old place again in sight of what was once your home, and I shall bring her to-morrow to see you, so I must now bid you good-morning until then."

"How strange everything has turned out," said Susan, as the door closed upon their visitor. "It seems like waking up, and finding that one great trouble we thought had happened to us was only a dream, after all."

"Yes, Susan, the darkness has indeed become light about us. I told you the cloud would have a silver lining."

The next morning, true to his promise, Mr. Somers again visited Helen, accompanied by his mother. The latter was delighted to find in the orphan girl the exact resemblance to her mother, and insisted upon taking her home with her. She also assured Susan that she would make her very useful and happy at Myrtle Lodge, and so the good old lady was induced to promise an immediate removal with Helen, to make it their permanent home there.

Restored to the place in which she was born, and which she was so fitted to adorn, Helen soon became the star of a brilliant circle. Once more she was the companion of Ernest Somers, and one evening, as she roamed with him through the grounds of her early home, which was now for sale, she promised to be the companion of his life journey.

Tears of joy filled her eyes, as a week later, he informed her that he had purchased her old home, and had made arrangements to have it refitted in the same style it used to wear in her father's time, and was to be their residence in the future.

The sun rose glorious over the hills and vales of Ashton on the bridal morning, and the little village was all astir, for a wedding there in church was a rare occurrence. Just before entering the carriage Ernest clasped upon the arm of Helen a magnificent bracelet.

"This is my wedding gift, dearest. To you it may suggest unpleasant recollections, but to me it will always be a reminder, that if it had not been for a bauble like this, I should not have found one, whom I prize above all the jewels in the world."

Nurse Susan was at the house, dressed in the veritable black silk gown, and wrought cap, that had been her holiday suit from time immemorial, and welcomed the bridal pair on their return from church. A full tide of joy filled the heart of Helen, as she stepped over the old familiar threshold, mistress of the dearest spot to her upon earth. And when she unclasped the pearl bracelet from her arm and gazed upon its pure gems, she murmured:

"Out of the darkest chapter in my life history has been evolved the glorious light which now gilds my pathway."

KEEP UP A CHEERFUL HEART.

BY WILLIAM H. DAVIS.

Keep up a cheerful heart,
 Though e'er so deep thy sorrow;
 Its sting may soon depart.
 And bring a bright to-morrow.
 The darkest storms there be
 Oft bring a day of brightness;
 So may it be with thee,
 Whose heart now sinks in darkness.

Then wear no saddened brow,
 As though in deep distress,
 When sorrows round thee throw
 Their pang of bitterness.
 Keep up a cheerful heart,
 With hope's star in thy breast;
 Act well on earth thy part,
 And leave to God the rest!

DEAD SEA APPLES.

BY A NEW CONTRIBUTOR.

THERE were no loud demonstrations of joy—no ringing of bells nor firing of cannon—no bonfires lighted nor wine drank—when an heir was born to the house of Calderwood. But the sun never shone on more happy and grateful hearts than theirs for the blessing which had been given them; and never did baby eyes meet more loving glances than were bestowed on the little Victor. The child's first years were spent in the soft and genial atmosphere of kindness. Not the injudicious kindness which becomes cruelty by enervating the body and denying the exercise needed to preserve a healthful tone—but that uniform gentleness and firmness which requires obedience and obtains it, and which brings a filial love and respect as its reward, that the ill-judging indulgence of many parents can never command.

Mr. Calderwood had married rather late in life, and his wife had passed the springtime of youth. Both had thought wisely and deeply upon the responsibilities of life—its cares, its hopes, its happiness, and the dangerous quicksands that sometimes wrecked its most richly-freighted harks. Well, indeed, might the wife take home these lessons to her heart; for, before Victor was five years old, Mr. Calderwood died. Patiently did the widow bear her sorrow—so patiently that only they who knew her best, knew how deeply the iron had entered her soul. One only hope remained to her, but it was a hope that bore many blossoms, and they all clustered around her son.

O, in this hollow world, what is there that can compare with the deep, lasting fervor of a mother's love? And when the object of that love is worthy, heaven is already begun in the household where it dwells. Where it is not worthy, the mother's love must be still more like that of the angels.

I loved Victor Calderwood like a brother. He was younger than myself, so much younger that I distinctly remembered the morning of his birth, and the gladness of my mother that her friend was blessed with a living child. As he grew up, my heart was twined with his, until we were one in the bonds of affection. We were educated at the same school and college, and in all respects were as brothers. My parents loved the fair, ingenuous youth, whom city temptations and college life were alike unable to spoil; and Mrs. Calderwood was my firm, unalterable friend. I linger over those days, because they were happier than any others I have known. Memory, like nature, has its green spots, its cool, silvery streams, its smooth, unruffled lakes. What wonder that we love to linger beside them all? And every day's, every hour's lingering there, draws some portion of the bitterness from my heart. I truly believe that "The tears that from repentance flow,

 In bright exhalation reach the skies."

Else, why am I permitted to have such peace as seems sometimes to flow into my heart? O, if repentance can atone, I have the record of years, in which tears of penitence and prayers for forgiveness have made up the sum of each day's experience. After we returned from college we entered into business as land agents and counselors. We were fortunate beyond our most sanguine hopes. We had apprehended a slow increase by unremitting attention; but we had an avalanche of business. We prospered—grew rich, in fact. We were courted, applauded, almost worshipped, because we were wealthy. We did not care for these things—Victor and I. We were young then, and worldly policy had not quite filled our hearts; so I need incur no charge of great vanity, if I say that scheming mothers and daughters sought the two retired and unsocial beings who never sought the latter in return. I do not think Mrs. Calderwood wished Victor to marry. She was content to receive all the love he had to bestow on woman, and grudged even the passing attentions which common courtesy demanded. Blame her not, ye who have many to love. Mrs. Calderwood had but one. What marvel then, if she dreaded to have another cross the bridge that united her to her son?

We were invited to a party one evening. Our host had recently removed to our town, and although neither of us had called on him, we were glad to have an opportunity that had hitherto been denied us through want of time, to make his acquaintance. We liked Mr. De Wolf at first sight. His wife and sons were equally agreeable, and a pretty daughter, just coming out into society, was one whom either of us might have coveted for a sister. We went again and again. Maud talked of her former home, and dwelt long and lovingly upon her cousin Diana, who, she said was coming to pass the summer with the family. Her name became with us a household word, from hearing the little fairy Maud name it so often. Especially was awakened Victor's curiosity to see Maud's paragon; and scarce a night passed that he did not importune me to go to Mr. De Wolf's.

His interest was rewarded; for, on calling one evening, we met a carriage turning from the house, and inside the door we encountered a pile of trunks, carpet-bags, boxes and baskets that none but a woman would think of taking care of through a journey. A harp-case and guitar-case portended a long stay. We were shown into the parlor, where we found only Mr. De Wolf—his feminine, he said, having been so absorbed in Di's arrival, as to forget him and any chance company that might arrive. However, he insisted on enforcing the invitation sent down to us from his wife, to remain and take tea with her; and after half an hour's delay, Maud led in somebody whom she called Miss Allston, and who we supposed was the actual Diana herself.

We sat down to tea. If there was a single instant in which Victor took his eyes from her face, I should have known it, for I watched narrowly. Never until that night had I felt jealous of his apparent superiority over me in person and manners. Victor was handsome, and had a certain distinguished air that I could never attain. He attracted her attention at last by his obvious admiration, and self-possessed as she usually seemed, she was betrayed into a deep blush. I came in for my share, too. I had never seen so beautiful a woman as Diana Allston. Besides her beauty, which was almost marvellous in its shape and depth of coloring, there was an irresistible charm about all she said or did, that won the heart and kept it.

I was deeply, irrecoverably in love before I knew it; and what was more, Victor was the same. I was in agony lest he should suspect the state of my feelings, and he, on the contrary, was constantly betraying his openly. Not one spark of my brotherly attachment had abated for him, but an uneasiness had arisen towards him—a pity, for I believed Di Allston loved me.

They who have gone on without loving for years are apt to take it hastily and rashly. I could not wait to know my fate gradually. A series of visits and such scanty amusements as a town affords, had brought us near each other daily; and I had had the felicity of attending her on horseback several times, riding slowly through the woods, and talking such sentimentalism as lovers are apt to do. Yet I could not clearly ascertain how prosperous my own suit might be, when Victor was admitted to the same familiar companionship; and I resolved to ask her boldly to share my lot. Not in such terms as I had heard of young men using—high-flown and far-fetched—but in such simple yet earnest words as I might speak without blushing for if I was rejected.

"Rejected! Forbid it, destiny!" I said, almost aloud, in my chamber, as I took my hat and gloves preparatory to a walk to Mr. De Wolf's.

I found Diana in the garden, alone. Her raised color, and excited yet happy look, encouraged me. I believed they were caused by the sight of myself, and I was not long in unfolding my purpose. She was visibly confused, but gathered voice to thank me for my preference. Her heart, she said, had long acknowledged my worth, but her affections were not her own! I believe truly that the demon entered my soul at that moment. I was choked, suffocated—and a stream of blood issued from my lips. That was not strange, for I had frequently bled slightly when any powerful emotion possessed me; but it frightened her—so few women can behold blood unmoved. It was not the work of a moment to stop it, and to hide the drops which had stained my clothes; but it was nearly dark, and without another word, I was off upon the high road, regardless of the call which she sent after me, begging me to go into the house and have some advice.

To whom should I go in my bitter disappointment but to Victor? And shut up with him in his own room that night, I had opened my lips to tell him what man seldom tells another, when his glad and joyous manner arrested me. I know not what wild words I might have spoken, but I do know that when my brain ceased from its sharp quivering, Victor was telling me of his love for Diana Allston, and her acceptance; of his mother's reluctant acquiescence, and Mr. De Wolf's approbation.

I had a fever. No one knew what caused it—for Diana was too high-minded to expose me. I was reduced to a child's weakness, but there were feelings of wrath within me that were yet strong as ever; and strongest, mightiest of all (that I should live to write it!) was the desire for Victor Calderwood's death! Through the frightfully hot nights in which I lay burning with fever, unable to raise my feeble hand to my head, I longed to strike him as he bent tenderly over me, and wept that I had not the strength to do it. Diana Allston's image was near me—her words in my ear, and they maddened me against him. I would not take medicine. I resisted the doctor and my mother, and bade them minister to the grinning fool at the head of my bed, as I called Victor. I could not, would not bear the sight of him. My mother comforted him with the thought that all delirious persons hated their friends during the paroxysm; and advised him to leave me. I turned my face to the wall and talked with the demons my disorder had called up; and each one that appeared, I called Victor Calderwood. I will not weary you with these wild vagaries. I recovered slowly. Victor came to see me again, and I treated him better. What was deficient in warmth of manner, he generously attributed to confused remembrances of my savageness towards him, and he tried to make me forget it.

"Come, Hal," he said to me, one delightful October day, when I had gained a little strength, "come out awhile with me. It will do you good."

I took his arm and went. O why did I go? Why was I permitted to go? Vain dreamer as I am, why do I perpetually question of things unknown? It is enough that I went.

Our destination was a spot where Victor and myself had often lingered. It was a charming retreat, beautiful for the fresh green foliage that still lingered on the trees, not one of which save the crimson maple had put on its autumnal hues. Below it was an ugly ravine, where a careless foot might too easily slip; a place of rocks, hidden by deceitful brambles, among which he who fell must be almost sure to be killed. He talked of Diana that day. She had gone home, he said, to prepare for marriage; and he paraded his hopes before me, and called upon me to rejoice in his happiness. O, how I hated him! We rose to go. I walked near the edge of that horrid place. He would have drawn me back, but I still went nearer.

"This would be a fine place for one who was weary of life," said I.

Victor shuddered. "Come away, dear Hal," he said. "I am sorry I brought you to this place. Let us return instantly." And he tried to wind his arm through mine. I turned round, appearing to yield, but when his foot was between me and the precipice, I suddenly tripped him.

He fell over without a struggle. That was the last I knew. It had exhausted the temporary strength I had, and I fainted on the edge of the abyss to which I had doomed him. I remember a shuddering horror that came upon me; a wish that I could save him, and the stretching forth of my arm. They who found us believed that he fell accidentally, and that I had attempted to rescue him from his fate. No one thought that the ravings of my subsequent sickness were really the promptings of a guilty spirit. I did not recover for months. The cold, dreary earth was covered with snow when I first walked out. What madness carried me to that very spot? I even looked over the perilous abyss, where Mrs. Calderwood had caused a strong iron fence to be erected, lest the accident that destroyed her son might be repeated in some one else. Poor lady! how she detailed to me the sad finding of her Victor, and wept when she paid tribute to the brotherly sympathy that had made me faint through terror at his danger! O, no rebuke is so hard to bear as undeserved praise.

I must not pause over the three years that followed. They were years in which conscience asserted her terrible rights. I had made use of my opportunities in those years. I was rich, honored and respected; not enough so, however, to make me insensible to the dreadful reaction which would take place in public estimation, were my crime suspected. When I was in good health, I managed to keep in good spirits, but when ill—and after that fever I was never strong—O God, what days and nights of agony I endured! And yet I had gained the prize for which I had sold my soul. Diana Allston was my wife. My apparent grief for Victor, my illness, and the care I took of Mrs. Calderwood had won her love and pity, and when time had softened her woe, she consented to marry me. There are times when I can scarce suppress the confession that trembles on my lips—yet why should I confess it? By so doing, I should not suffer any more than I have already—but they whom I love and who love me, and believe me incapable of wrong, would be punished through me immeasurably. Shall I then make them miserable, when too, it will deprive me of further space for repentance? I do not know what is right. That is the worst part of a sinful deed, that it destroys the power of judging what is right.

Friday, May 10.—This day a child was born to me. When the nurse brought it to me, I was about to kiss its forehead, but I instantly recoiled. She laughed heartily, supposing that I feared to hurt the little creature. Alas! it was only because the child might one day be called the son of a murderer! Mrs. Calderwood has been with Diana all night, and she has proffered a request that the boy may be called Victor! I groaned in agony, and she hastened to recall her request. I will have it so, however. Let me accept every form of punishment. Yet how—O how can I ever pronounce his name?

I have been within the walls of a mad-house. No wonder! I must have uttered horrors, any one of which would have condemned me to death, unless I could have been proved insane. Poor souls! They look at me with such pitying eyes—Diana and Mrs. Calderwood and my little Victor. The boy is five years old, and I have never seen him since he was as many days, until three days ago, I was brought home, being pronounced well. But I am not well in frame, if I am in mind. My emotions, having tried so long to conceal them, have worn me out, as the waters wear the stone, or rather as the winds wear the sails of a ship. I wonder if they saw this horrible record of mine while I was mad? No. Such is the beautiful propriety and delicacy of Diana's mind, that she would shrink from the examination of even her husband's papers. I found them as I ever kept them, in the secret drawer of my desk.

My little Victor! I can bear now to hear his name pronounced; for I feel that my sin is forgiven. I have knelt for hours of each night, when all the household were buried in sleep, asking forgiveness of God; and nothing but the misery and disgrace which it would bring upon the innocent, keeps me from open confession. Earth has no tortures which I have not inwardly endured. My life is wretched; for all that should be joys, are but as Dead Sea apples to me. All that constitutes the sweetness of home ties, proves the very gall of bitterness in my cup. And still I wear a serene look, because I must not show what is passing within. And yet I feel, O God, that thou hast forgiven me! Spirit of my dead Victor, thou too hast forgiven me! Heaven does not deem me impenitent, because I dare not disgrace my child by telling the world that which concerns them not. Groping beneath the altar stairs, I can still raise my hand to God, and in the dimness I behold a line of heavenly light shining down, I doubt not from his throne, to show me, that though guilty of blood, he will not utterly cast me away. I do not seek to palliate my deed; but surely that terrible fever must have left something of insanity in my brain. I would think so of another. May I not give some small share of exculpation to myself?

My little Victor is calling me. He has begged from Mrs. Calderwood the miniature of her son, and now, regardless of his father's torture, he is dwelling with the minute observation of a child, upon the hair, the eyes, the bright red lips, that seem almost to live. And Diana, who has freighted all her hopes anew upon her husband and her child, answers his questions about him whom he calls his dead uncle with a serene face, as if his death were but an ordinary dispensation of providence, and not through the wrong of man.

MAHOMEDAN SERMONIZING.

One morning, Nassr-Eddyn-Effendi ascended into his pulpit to preach, and addressing his hearers, said:

"O, believers! know ye what I am going to talk to you about?"

They replied they did not.

"Well, then," rejoined he, "since you do not know, do you suppose that I am going to tell you?"

Another morning he again appeared in the pulpit, and said:

"O, believers! know ye not what I am going to tell you?"

They replied that they did.

"If you know it," said he, "I need not tell it to you." And he descended from the pulpit and went his way.

His auditors, puzzled what to do, at length agreed that if he again made his appearance, some of them would say that they knew, others that they did not.

And again Nassr-Eddyn-Effendi mounted into the pulpit, and said:

"O, Mussulmans! know ye what I am going to say to you?"

To which some replied, "We know;" others, "We know not."

"Good!" returned he; "let those who know tell those who do not."—Mysteries of the Desert.

THE JEWS OF SHIRAZ.

Away to Shiraz, ceaselessly travelling over plains and mountains, sleeping in the open air, amidst torrents of rain, and pursued by earthquakes. Wolff had been warned what he must expect in visiting the Jews at Shiraz, and the description of their misery had not been exaggerated. A Persian Mussulman, of whom he had inquired their condition some time before, had said: "First. Every house in Shiraz with a low, narrow entrance, is a Jew's house. Secondly. Every man with a dirty woolen or dirty camel's hair turban is a Jew. Thirdly. Every coat much torn and mended about the back, with worn sleeves, is a Jew's coat. Fourthly. Every one picking up old broken glass is a Jew. Fifthly. Every one searching dirty robes, and asking for old shoes and sandals, is a Jew. Sixthly. The house into which no quadruped but a goat will enter is a Jew's." All which things, of course, came into Wolff's mind, as, in company with two Armenians, he approached the street where the Jews resided.—Rev. J. Wolff.

The Florist.

When once the sun sinks in the west,
And dewdrops pearl the evening's breast:
Almost as pale as moonbeams are,
Or its companionable star,
The evening primrose opens anew
Its delicate blossom to the dew;
And, hermit-like, shunning the light,
Wastes its fair bloom upon the night,
Who, blindfold to its fond cares,
Knows not the beauty he possesses.—CLARE.

Grafting the Camellia.

This is a delicate operation in floriculture. One of the modes of performing it, and which is generally practised in the autumn, is a kind of side grafting, or rather of inarching. It consists in cutting off a small portion of the bark of the stock, with very little wood attached, from the side of the stem, or one of the branches, leaving a leaf and bud above it; and then cutting the scion into a chisel-shape, so as to fit the wound in the stock exactly, and blinding the two together with a piece of bass matting, without using any other covering. As soon as the operation is finished, the pot containing the stock should be laid horizontally on a bed of dry and cold tan, or on a bed of dry moss, the branches lying on the surface and the pot being half buried in the tan or moss, the grafted part being covered with a bell-glass, and stuffed round the bottom with the tan or moss, so as to prevent a particle of air from entering. This close covering is kept on for a fortnight, three weeks or a month, according to the season, at the end of which time the graft will be found perfectly united to the stock. Air is then admitted to the graft by degrees, by first loosening and then removing the mass from the glass; then the glass, when the rot may be placed erect. The great points to be attended to in this mode of grafting, are giving the plants bottom heat, and covering them closely in the manner described.

Calceolaria.

The great variety which now characterizes this family renders it a favorite, and half a dozen well chosen sorts are very attractive in the garden or greenhouse. They keep well in a cold frame during the winter, but do better in a greenhouse, where they will blossom finely. As soon as they have done flowering they should be re-potted in light soil, one third loam and two thirds peat, for if much excited they are apt to fade away. If you wish to propagate them, all the shoots taken off will take root readily; but as every root sends up its flower-stalk, they should be allowed to spread and fill a large-sized pot.

Bossiaea.

This is one of the immense family of pea-flowering plants, requiring the same treatment as Botany Bay plants in general—growing best in one third loam and two-thirds peat. This, like almost other plants, must be checked while growing to make them stout and bushy.

Holly.

This beautiful evergreen tree is found in America, Europe, Japan, and some other countries. It has shining, prickly leaves near the ground; smooth high ones. It blows white flowers, and its berries are of a scarlet color.

American Laurel.

This is a North American genus. Its foliage is of a deep dark green, with beautiful flowers, crimson, red and peach-blossom color. The species are numerous, and it is sometimes called calico bush.

Propagation of Roses.

Roses may be propagated in various ways. Cuttings placed in warm sandy soil, and covered with a window sash and frequently watered, will generally strike in a short time. The hardy kinds are more commonly increased by layers. In the early part of the summer select a young, well-ripened shoot, make a slit upward in it, about half way through, just below a bud; in the tongue thus formed insert a small chip, to prevent its closing up, then peg down the shoot in the soil three or four inches below the surface, fill up the hole, and cover the earth with moss, grass, or a flat stone. The extremity of the layer should be several inches above the ground, and be tied to a stake to prevent injury to the forming rootlets. Some cultivators increase their roses by budding and grafting, believing that feeble, low-growing varieties are improved by inserting them on vigorous stocks. This is an easy way of multiplying choice and rare plants.

Aphelandra.

There are two of this family, afrikana and aurantiaca, both sub-shrubs—one growing three feet high, and bearing a spike of scarlet tubular flowers in August, and the other blooming orange-colored at the same time. They require a compost of loam and peat in equal quantities, shocking white young, and shifting from one sized pot to another as they fill with roots. If neglected, they will grow too tall to be handsome.

Witch Hazel.

This is an American genus, which flowers in the autumn, and perfects its fruit in the next summer. The color of the flowers is yellow. The twigs of this plant have been used as divining-rods, to discover secret treasures and mines.

Virgin's Bower—Clematis Viorna.

About thirty species of this genus are scattered over the world, several of which are indigenous to America. It is found in the Southern States. The root is perennial; its flowers are purple, though there is a variety with white flowers.

Rosa Damascena.

The beautiful damask, or damascena rose was first brought from Asia into Greece, thence transplanted into Italy and France, and then to other countries. Its flowers are white and red.

Coronilla.

A very old greenhouse plant, but of easy culture; a good winter bloomer, and bearing almost any amount of ill-usage. Its yellow pea-shaped blossom literally covers the plant in winter.

Indigafera.

Several of these are in cultivation, but the proportion of flower to foliage is too small to please all. They are a pea-flowering shrub, and not remarkably beautiful.

Coreopsis Arkansa.

This is an American genus of about thirty species. It flowers in June, and continues in flower until the autumn, bearing yellow flowers.

Cardinal Flower, or Lobelia Cardinalis.

The flowers of this plant are of a bright scarlet. It is a native of North America, growing by the sides of rivers and ditches. It is a very beautiful flower.

The Housewife.

The Cuisine.

We hear from all quarters of the excellence and purity of Burnett's flavoring extracts, and can recommend them confidently to our readers for flavoring custards, pies, ice-creams, blanc-mange, jellies, sauces, etc. The list of flavors embraces lemon, orange, nutmeg, vanilla, peach, ginger, almond, cinnamon, rose, cloves, cherry and nectarine. They have all the freshness and flavor of the delicate fruits from which they are prepared, and are much less expensive, besides having the advantage of keeping for any length of time and in any climate. All respectable druggetts have these extracts for sale.

Gum-Arabic Paste.

Take a common sized teaspoon of cold soft water, and dissolve in it a large teaspoonful of the best and cleanest powdered gum-Arabic. When the gum is entirely melted, stir in by degrees a tablespoonful of fine wheat flour, carefully pressing out all the lumps, and making it as smooth as possible. Keep it closely covered, and in a cool place. If, after a few days, it should appear spotted or mouldy on the top, remove the surface, and the paste beneath will still be fit for use. This is a good cement for artificial flowers, and for ornamental pasteboard work.

A Fillet of Veal stewed white.

Add to one pint of water or gravy a little lemon-peel, mace, nutmeg, white pepper and salt; put a fillet in, stuffed as for roasting, and when it has stewed one hour and a half take it out, and strain the gravy; add two dozen oysters, half a pint of white wine, and butter rubbed in flour; put the veal in again, and stew it half an hour; just before serving stir in half a pint of cream. The gravy should be rather thick, and poured over the veal.

An excellent Furniture Polish.

Into one pint of linseed oil put half a pound of treacle and a glass of gin; then, stirring well, apply sparingly with a linen rag, and if rubbed until quite dry with linen cloths, this mixture will produce a splendid gloss. Eating tables should be covered with oil-cloth or baize, to prevent staining, and be instantly rubbed when the dishes are removed.

To keep off Mosquitoes and other Insects.

Camphor is a most powerful agent. A camphor bag hung up in an open chamber will prove an effectual barrier to their entrance. Camphorated spirit applied as perfume to the face and hands will act as an effectual preventive; but when bitten by them, aromatic vinegar is the best antidote.

The Hoarseness of Singers.

A celebrated singer informed M. Diday that the greatest benefit is derived from taking, during five or six days, twice a day, five or six drops of nitric acid in a glass of sugared water. If from use the acid seems to lose its original efficacy, the dose may be increased to ten or eleven drops.

To remove Corns from between the Toes.

These corns are generally more painful than any others, and are frequently so situated as to be almost inaccessible to the usual remedies. Wetting them several times a day with hartshorn will, in most cases, cure them. Try it.

Painted Floor Carpets.

Floor-cloths may be cleaned with a mixture of magnesia, only milk-warm, followed by warm water, in the same manner that carpets are cleaned. They should be rubbed with a dry flannel till nearly dried, then again wet over with a sponge dipped in milk, and immediately dried and rubbed with a flannel till the polish is restored. This is a process much to be preferred to that of rubbing the cloth with wax, which leaves it sticky and liable to retain dust and dirt for a long time. Very hot water should never be used in cleaning floor-cloths, as it brings off the paint.

Cleansing Sofa Coverings.

If the covers of sofas and chairs are dirty, they may be cleansed without being removed, by first washing them over with warm water and soap rubbed over them with a flannel; then, before they are dry, sponge them over with a strong solution of salt and water, in which a small quantity of gall has been mixed. The windows of the room should be opened, so as to secure a perfect drying, and the colors and the freshness of the articles will be restored.

Mirrors.

Cleansing mirrors is an easy operation, when rightly understood. The greatest care should be taken in cleaning a mirror to use only the softest articles, lest the glass should be scratched. It should first be dusted with a feather-brush, then washed over with a sponge dipped in spirits, to remove the fly-spots; after this, it should be dusted with the powder-blue in a thin muslin bag, and finally polished with an old silk handkerchief.

To clean Steel Articles.

Polished steel articles, if rubbed every morning with leather, will not become dull or rusty; but if rust has been suffered to gather, it must be immediately removed by covering the steel with sweet oil, and allowing it to remain on for two days; then sprinkle it over with finely-powdered unslaked lime, and rub it with polishing leather.

To clean Whitewash Brushes.

Wash off with cold water the lime from the bristles of the brush, and scrub well with a hard scrubbing-brush the part where the bristles are fixed into the wood. This should be done at once, as soon as the whitewashing for that day is finished. It is far better than to let them soak all night.

To remove Grease from a Stove-Hearth.

When oil or any other grease has been dropped on a stove hearth, immediately cover the place with very hot ashes. After awhile clear away the ashes, and if the grease has not quite disappeared, repeat the process.

To remove the Odor from a Vial.

The odor of its last contents may be removed from a vial by filling it with cold water, and letting it stand in any airy place uncorked for three days, changing the water every day.

Potatoe Pie.

One pound of boiled potatoes rolled fine, half a pound of butter, six eggs, eight spoonful of milk, the grated peel and juice of a lemon, sugar and salt to your taste. To be baked in deep plates.

Excellent Vinegar.

Five gallons of water, half a gallon of molasses, half a gallon of common spirits; one pint of yeast; roll a sheet of paper in the yeast. Set it in a warm place to ferment.

Curious Matters.

A hard Bear-Fight.

The best story of the season is the following:—At Penman's Ranch, Cal., three hunters encountered a bear, which they wounded with six shots. The bear pursued and caught one of them, and while the others fled, the captured hunter had a hand to paw fight with the monster. Having nothing but a short dirk-knife, he seized the bear by the tongue and attempted to use the dirk, but the blade bent on the bear's ribs. Having dragged the animal's tongue through the corner of its mouth, the creature could use his paws only, with which the man was terribly torn, his scalp having been knocked off by the bear's claws. At length the exhausted hunter let go the tongue and the bear made off, but was killed the next day, and weighed 600 pounds. The man recovered.

A singular Discovery.

The Ottawa (Canada) Citizen says:—"One day last week, while some laborers were removing stone from a quarry in this vicinity, they came upon a stone measuring between three and four feet in length, some eighteen inches in width, and about eight inches thick, bearing on its surface the unmistakable impress of two human feet, the largest that of an Indian's right and the smaller that of a squaw's moccasined foot, sunk about three-fourths of an inch in the solid stone. We have seen the stone and the strange impressions it bears, but have to leave the enigma to be explained by those better posted in things beneath the earth than ourselves."

Queer Law Case.

A most extraordinary case has been submitted to the civil tribunal of Lyons:—A cobbler, a tinker, and a small tradesman pleaded each against the other to be declared sole owner of what they all described as the most marvellous discovery, namely, the placing of a lamp in the heel of a boot, with pipes running from it beneath the sole, so as to heat the foot! After examining the different pretensions of the parties, the tribunal declined to pronounce on the question of ownership, but condemned the cobbler and the trader to pay the tinker 150 francs for work done.

Be careful.

A short time ago a man named Erret, of Hempfield township, Westmoreland county, died after a painful and lingering malady, produced, as is believed, by accidentally swallowing an insect while drinking at a spring, in which were dark insects having numerous feet. He said he had swallowed one of them, and felt great uneasiness and violent coughing, for which he could get no relief. A few days before his death he coughed up a worm of the color and description of those in the spring at the time he drank out of it.

The Fuller Cradle.

A correspondent of the Middleboro' Gazette says:—"We saw while in Abington, at the house of Mr. F. L. Noyes, the ancient family cradle of Dr. Samuel Fuller, who came over in the Mayflower, and was one of the signers of the Social Compact. A tradition exists that this cradle was on board the Mayflower, and that it was used to rock Peregrine White, the first New Englander. It was made mostly of oak, framed together, and appears to have suffered but little in rocking seven or eight generations of the Fuller descent. It still remains in a branch of the Fuller family."

Wonderful Phenomenon.

A curious story, authenticated by names and dates, is furnished to the New Haven Journal and Courier. It is, that a lady during a shower saw a distinct current of lightning pass from one window to another. She found in two places upon the carpet a substance burning with a bright white flame, and emitting a strong sulphurous odor. There being no fire in the house at the time, the fact seems conclusive that they were drops of the fluid which had fallen, or been ejected from the current in its passage through the apartment.

Human Hair.

In 1899 a coffin was discovered in the abbey church of Romsey, England, which had originally contained the body of a female of the Norman period. The bones had entirely decayed, but the hair, with its characteristic indestructibility, was found entire, and appeared as if the skull had only recently been removed from it, and having plaited tails eighteen inches in length. It is still preserved in a glass case, lying upon the same block of oak which has been its pillow for centuries.

Curious Fact.

Sir David Brewster, inquiring into the history of the stereoscope, finds that its fundamental principle was well known even to Euclid; that it was distinctly described by Galen 1600 years ago; and that Glambatiata Porta had, in 1599 given such a complete drawing of the two separate pictures as seen by each eye, and of the combined picture placed between them, that we recognise in it not only the principle but the construction of the stereoscope.

A Humming-Bird's Nest.

The Marysville (Cal.) Journal thus describes a humming-bird's nest in the garden of William Hawley, in that town:—"The nest contained two of their young. It is about the size of a black walnut, of a very fine texture, almost white, much resembling woolen cloth, and firmly bound to the twig of a peach-tree within three feet of the ground. The young birds are not much larger than grains of coffee, and present a very singular appearance."

A bearded Woman.

The Marysville (Ky.) Eagle gives an account of a bearded woman residing in Lewis county, in the same State. It is said she had no indications of beard until last September, when the hair commenced growing upon her face, growing very fast sometimes, as much as half an inch a week. She now has a heavy black beard, coarse like that of a man. A space of about an inch in width from the mouth over the chin to her neck is free from hair.

A valuable Compass.

There has been lately invented a compass, which is so constructed and operated upon as to give at all times the specific leeway of a vessel. It may be placed on a table in the captain's cabin, and will inform of the least deviation from the course to which the vessel may be heading. It is claimed that it will work perfectly correct, no matter how much agitated by the motion of the vessel.

Singular Place for a Nest.

A bird has built its nest in the letter-box at Sparham, England. Notwithstanding the postman's daily calls to take the letters deposited there, the bird is not disturbed. Sometimes he has taken the letters from the bird's back.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FIRESIDE TRAVELLERS.

For every man who gratifies his roving disposition by visiting Europe, there are a thousand who, for various good and sufficient reasons, never stir far away from home. But a very small proportion of those who do go abroad profit by their journeyings. We have just been reading a hand-book—and a very good one, by the way—which tells you how to do Europe, that is, England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Belgium, Germany and Italy in four months. Such a tour must of course be a very racy one, and it can be accomplished by a single man at an outlay of from 800 to 1200 dollars; if he is a good, generous fellow, and takes his wife with him, it will cost a little more than double, say from 2500 to 3000 dollars, that is, for travelling in first-rate style. Now what is the result of this race through Europe? Why, our traveller friend is able to say, with his hand on his heart, that he has been in Dublin, Cork, Edinboro', Glasgow, London, Paris, Brussels, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Geneva, Rome, etc.; but how much has he really seen of those celebrated cities? You might as well expect a man who has been looking through a rapidly-revolving kaleidoscope for half an hour to have a distant recollection of all the brilliant combinations and figures of that curious instrument. In his memory all sort of scenes must be jumbled together, like toys in a child's play-room, and he must find it very difficult to locate properly even such bulky objects as churches, galleries and statues.

We have a great mind to write a hand-book of Europe for "fireside" travellers, forlorn members of the Can't-get-away Club. Accompanying the book should be a fine stereoscopic instrument, with four or five dozen slides. These wonderful stereoscopic views of European scenes, calmly and deliberately studied, actually give the observer a clearer notion of the scenes depicted than can be obtained by the hasty traveller who casts a hurried glance at them under unfavorable circumstances. He may be in a haste to catch a certain railroad train or a certain steamer, or in a worry about his baggage or passport, or thinking about the failure of a rascally banker with whom his funds were lodged; but no such annoyances disturb the equanimity of our tarry-at-home traveller. Look at these pyramids and Sphinxes, the wonders of the Nile-land. The marvellous picture before you was painted by rays reflected from the very stones themselves. They must be correct, for Nature herself was the artist. Lo! the majestic dome of St. Peters! the cathedral of Notre Dame! the icy summit of Mt. Blanc! the "castled crags of Drachenfels!" Killarney, London, Paris! Two centuries ago, had photography been known, the operator would have been roasted at the stake for practising the black art. Really, what with books and stereoscopes, an idle or a poor man need not go to Europe to learn as much as he need to know about the old world.

What an economy of time and money! What an avoidance of seasickness, of the smell of oil and smoke, and bilge-water that adds to the nausea of the ocean-crossing voyager! Your fireside traveller needs no passport, no letters of introduction, no letters of credit. When he is tired of sight-seeing, he shuts up his box and returns to his normal condition. He can go from Venice to Amsterdam, from Syria to Scotland in the twinkling of an eye.

We do not profess to have originated the idea, however. Many books of travel have been written by persons who never left their native land. This is one of the tricks of the book-making trade, well understood by Grub-Street hacks. But waiving originality, we claim that our views are entitled to respectful consideration, as the diplomatists say.

PRIZE-FIGHTING.—The New Hampshire legislature has passed a very severe law for the prevention of prize-fighting. The Granite State will henceforth be studiously avoided by the fancy.

A QUERY.—Throw a piece of meat among bears, and a purse of gold among men, and which will behave most outrageously—the men or the beasts?

THE FIRST STEAMBOAT.

So many steamboats now navigate our rivers, lakes and oceans, that it seems hard to realize there were none in the United States sixty years ago. When Robert Fulton built his first steamboat for the Hudson River, scarcely anybody thought it would move. The Commercial Bulletin tells a good story from the lips of an old captain at South Boston, who met this steamer as it was going down the river :

"Captain H—, at the time we speak of, commanded a sloop which plied as a regular packet between Boston and Albany. Besides himself there were the mate, two hands, and the cabin boy. The sloop was bound from Boston to Albany with a cargo of notions, and when about half way between New York and Albany the wind came round ahead, and the sloop was obliged to anchor, and all hands turned in to enjoy themselves in the cabin, hoping that with the turn of the tide there would come a change of wind. At about nine o'clock the captain sent the cabin boy on deck to get some water. He had hardly got upon the deck before he returned dashing down the companion-way head foremost, with terror depicted on his countenance. The captain hailed him in a rough voice to know what was the matter. As soon as the boy could sufficiently recover from his fright, he exclaimed :

" 'We are lost! we are lost! The evil one is coming for us!'

"No persuasion or threat could induce the boy to return on deck. The captain then sent one of the hands, but he returned more precipitately than the boy, and confirmed his opinion. The other man was sent, but with no better success. The mate, though he trembled in every joint, felt that the dignity of the profession must be maintained; and he followed up the companion-way; but after a pause of a minute or two, came down, and in solemn tones declared his belief that Beelzebub was let loose, and that their time had come. It was now the time for Captain H—; all hands looking to him as a kind of natural protector. So assuming a courage he by no means felt, he proceeded on deck, all hands following him; and sure enough, to use his own expression, 'there was a sight which made my blood curdle, and my hair stand on end.' Far away in the blackness of the night they saw a huge body coming down upon them, against wind and tide, vomiting out flame and smoke; they could hear the chains clank, and by the light of the furnace they could discern four men, begrimed with smoke, feeding the fire. It was terrible! On she came, puffing and blowing; the sound of the clanking chains was nearer and nearer. In the agony of despair all hands fell to praying and confessing their sins. Still on she came; when, O, horrors! they feel the heat and smell the smoke! but she swiftly glided by them, and left them unharmed! They rose from their knees in mute astonishment. The tide and wind soon changed, and they weighed anchor and proceeded to Albany, fully convinced they had seen the arch enemy."

LONDON UNDERGROUND RAILWAY.

The London Illustrated News lately gave a description of the tunnel now being built under the streets of London, for the purpose of connecting the city with the series of railways at the north of the Thames. To have a railway after the American fashion, passing through a densely populous district, and crossing on a level and over crowded thoroughfares, was considered out of the question. Therefore, the plan was resorted to of avoiding the surface altogether, leaving that to the ordinary local traffic and travel, and going entirely under the city with all the passenger and freight trains. The tunnel was constructed by making an open cut from the surface of the street down the distance required, building the archway, and then replacing the surface—a cheaper mode than tunnelling. The work is now in progress, the company engaged in it having a capital of four millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. To avoid annoyance from smoke or the combustion of fuel in the tunnel, the traffic is to be worked by light locomotives of a novel and ingenious construction. They have no fire-box, but will be charged with hot water and steam at a certain pressure, to be supplied by fixed boilers, at the termini, and will be furnished with a large heater to assist in maintaining the required temperature. It is believed that each locomotive can be supplied with power sufficient to run the whole tunnel distance. The tunnel is expected to be finished and in working order by 1862.

THE NEW YORK SEVENTH REGIMENT.—

At the last inspection, this splendid regiment had 910 men under arms. Their expenses last year were $56,000.

PATENTS.—About one hundred and twenty new patents, it is said, are issued every week from the patent-office in Washington.

THE COST OF SMOKE.—In one city alone, New York, cigar smoke costs over five million dollars a year—nearly as much as the bread eaten.

ENGLISH YACHTS.

The universal interest just now felt in yachting, in this country, induces us to suppose that a few facts we have compiled in reference to aquatic sports on the other side of the water, may be acceptable to our readers. The British yacht-clubs include in their fleets cutters, schooners, brigs, sloops, luggers and yawls—even steamers. There are yachts on the Clyde and Mersey barely exceeding two tons each, while the "Brilliant" yacht, belonging to the commodore of the Victoria yacht-club, is of 480 tons. There are no fewer than twelve hundred yachts in the British seas and rivers. Many of them are of iron.

So far as a cruise is concerned, each yacht is a little commonwealth in itself, independent of all other yachts; but for the sake of regattas and racings, of certain privileges, and of general sociability, they are grouped into fleets, each belonging to a distinct club. The crack club of the whole is the Royal Yacht Squadron, whose head-quarters are at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, with the Earl of Wilton for its commodore or chief yachtsman. There are a score of other large yacht-clubs and many more small ones; and as there are twelve hundred yachts now on the British list, a little school-boy arithmetic will lead us to the conclusion that the average number of yachts belonging to the former class, is about sixty—twenty fleets of sixty strong each. Nominally, but not really, this number is increased; for some of the yachts belong to two or more clubs. The clubs themselves are very like other clubs; the members are balloted for, and, if admitted, pay a certain admission fee, and a certain annual subscription. The admission fee varies from one guinea to fifteen guineas in different clubs, and the subscription fee from one guinea to eight guineas a year—the aristocratic "Royal Squadron" of Cowes being the most costly of all. About one-half of the clubs have club-houses, buildings owned or rented by them for holding their meetings; the others meet at hotels or other places, with the secretary's residence as a sort of official place of reference.

Some of the yachts make long voyages. We read of Lord Byron's yacht Mazeppa, a daring felucca-rigged thing of about a hundred and fifty tons, in which he went to Corsica and Sardinia; of Sir John Ross's tiny cutter of seven tons, in which, with only a boy to help him, he once came from Stockholm to England; of American cutters from twenty to forty tons each, which have more than once crossed the broad Atlantic; of the Teazer, of fourteen tons, which went from England to Jamaica and back in 1852; and of many similar exploits. Then there have been many yacht-voyages which have been made the subject of volumes of peculiar interest. The Nancy Dawson penetrated through Behring's Strait into the Arctic Sea, and rendered aid to some of our navigators who were in search of Sir John Franklin. The yacht-voyage of the Maria to Faroe was full of interest; and still more so was Lord Dufferin's voyage in the Foam. The Allen Gardiner, a yacht built for one of the missionary societies, was placed, in 1857, under the command of Mr. Snow, who had previously distinguished himself in the Arctic regions; and in it he made a two years' cruise in the seas around Patagonia, Terra del Fuego, and the Auckland Islands. The late Robert Stephenson made many long voyages in his pet yacht Titania; and he lent it, together with its crew of sixteen men, to Professor Piazzi Smyth, for his remarkable voyage to Teneriffe for astronomical purposes. In order to facilitate the movements of these cruising yachts, a few privileges have been awarded by foreign governments to yachtsmen. An immense amount of money is expended in the building and sailing of these yachts.

DISBELIEVING A LAWYER.—"May it please your honor," said a lawyer, addressing one of the city judges, "I brought the prisoner from jail on a habeas corpus." "Well," said a fellow in an undertone, who stood in the rear of the court, "these lawyers will say anything; I saw the man get out of a cab at the court door."

MILLINERS.—Do the admirers of pretty milliners know why they are called so? Not one in a million. The name comes from Milan, the city from which Milan-ary goods were first imported into England.

---

CHANGEABLE.—The Webster Times says a widow has just moved from that town who has, during her experience in housekeeping, removed from one locality to another twenty-four times.

---

AN EXCEPTION TO A RULE.—Whenever a man exclaims that all mankind are villains, be assured that he contemplates an instant offer of himself as an exception.

---

A FOURTH OF JULY TOAST.—Woman—To her virtue, we give our love; to her beauty, our admiration; and to her hoops, we give—way.

---

A NECESSITY.—A man is obliged to keep his word, when nobody will take it.

WITCHCRAFT.

If we scan the history of the past, we must admit that the delusions of witchcraft were the most terrible in their results of any of those widespread errors which crazed the world in days of old. The fear of witchcraft was upon all classes; the wisest and best of men were carried away by the prevailing delusion, as well as the vulgar and the vicious. The charge of witchcraft was made with ease, but repelled with the utmost difficulty. The frenzy was so powerful, that people were known not only to admit, but to accuse themselves of the crime, and to die on a plea of guilty to a ridiculous and impossible offence!

From the earliest ages a dread of witchcraft haunted the human mind, and the popular superstition was frequently employed for the gratification of private vengeance, innocent persons being tortured and executed on the charge. At different periods a wholesale attack was made against witches—a crusade headed by witch-finders, and armed with the full powers of civil and ecclesiastical law. Charlemagne gave orders that all necromancers, astrologers and witches should be driven from his empire, and the exercise of every sort of magic was forbidden, on pain of death. Special exertions were used to hunt out all those to whom the slightest suspicion attached, but it was left for more recent times to carry out thoroughly the cruelty and injustice of these inquiries. In England, during the times of the Tudors and Stuarts, especially the latter—for James I. was wofully afraid of witches—the severest penalties were inflicted on those suspected of dealing in the Black Art. Sworn tormentors, known as witch-finders, were empowered to inquire into every alleged case, and to make journeys, like judges on circuit, through the country, holding in every town or village, if they pleased, their court of ordeal. The aged or afflicted were generally the objects of suspicion. Charged with blighting the corn, with bringing an epidemic among the cattle, with causing epileptic fits or the falling sickness, with being in league with Satan, with changing their form at pleasure, with keeping witches' Sabbaths—what reply could they make? Denial was useless, and they were expected to convict themselves. Every witch was supposed to bear a Satanic mark on some part of her person, and the method adopted to find this mark—which was supposed to be incapable of pain—was to stick sharp pins and needles into her flesh; if her sufferings were acute, it was regarded as a favorable sign, but the torture was generally continued till the miserable sufferer lost consciousness, or pleaded guilty to the charge. The stake or the gallows were the penalties of conviction, but many wretched beings sought this as a happy deliverance from the tortures inflicted by the witch-finders. The laws of England, which were so severely directed against witchcraft, were adopted in the American colonies, and in 1645 the mania commenced, and several persons were tried for this supposed crime.

A BOA CONSTRICTOR FIGHT.

Two large rock boa constrictors, belonging to Wombwell's collection—at present at Plymouth, England—were, during the hours of exhibition, placed in a glass case for the purpose of being fed. A rabbit was put into the case, and one of the boas immediately made for the prey. The rabbit, however, eluded the fangs of its enemy by a sudden jump, and the enormous snake, instead of dealing its deadly blow on the poor rabbit, fastened on the other boa, which, finding itself assaulted, immediately assumed the defensive in the most determined manner. Boa number two struck boa number one, by which it had been assaulted, with its frightful fangs. The struggle was now fiercely maintained on both sides. The two monsters writhed and struggled in one another's grasp, and both seemed intent on pressing by its constructive coil the life out of his opponent. This struggle was at last terminated by the keepers, with the assistance of several gentlemen, but not before one of the combatants was so seriously wounded, that fears are entertained that the consequences may prove fatal.

UNEXPECTED QUARTER.—A young gentleman from the "rural districts" lately advertised for a wife through the papers, and got answers from eighteen husbands stating that he could have theirs.

WOMAN.—A Hindoo female recently said to a Christian lady: "Really, your Bible must have been written by a woman, it contains so many kind things about us. Our Shasters say nothing but what is hard and cruel of us."

ACID FOOD.—Acids in summer are important in promoting the separation of bile from the blood. Hence the craving for currants, and other fruits, is natural.

PLAGIARISM.—An English clergyman at Holloway, England, has been detected in preaching the sermons of Rev. Dr. Bushnell, of Hartford, from the published volumes in this country.

A HIGHWAY ADVENTURE.

We had thought that the days of highwaymen, or, in classic Romany, "high tobymen," were passed and gone, like the days of chivalry which Edmund Burke lamented in melodious phrase, that Paul Cliffords existed only in the realms of fiction, and that the type of Claude Duval was utterly extinct. But a recent occurrence in California, not only revives all our reminiscences of the road in its palmy state, but furnishes a scene equal to any in the records of romantic rascality. We allude to the robbery of the money of Wells, Fargo & Co., some weeks ago, near Chico, Butte county.

Fancy the stage with five inside passengers, descending into a gulch, or canon. The driver is called upon to halt, and pulls up his team, thinking that some wagon has got stuck in the mud, and there is imminent danger of collision. But he is soon undeceived, for his eyes light on several men, masked, one of whom is levelling a double-barrelled gun. Another, masked and armed also, springs on the box.

"Throw down your reins," said he.

The driver obeyed.

"Give up your arms," said the robber to the express agent.

There was nothing to be done but to obey. The man handed his pistol to the robber.

"What!" cried the robber chief, reproachfully, as he looked at it, "cocked? O, Charley, there would have been sad work, if you had fired."

"Gentlemen," said he, to the passengers, putting his head inside the coach, "I intend you no harm, either in person or property, provided you make no resistance. Hold up your hands, to let me see whether you are armed."

Five pair of hands were instantly raised.

"Good," said the robber.

"Look here, stranger said one of the passengers, "just be good enough to ask your friend there to raise his piece, the barrel is on a level with our heads, and an awkward accident might happen—a nervous twitch of his forefinger, and—"

"Say no more," said the robber. "Present arms!"

And the double-barrelled gun of the rascal on the ground was brought to a poise.

"Now for the money-box," said the robber, and selecting it from the baggage he lifted it down to the roadside. Picking up a rock, he was about to smash the lid, when he suddenly paused.

"It would be a shame to destroy the company's property so," he muttered, "Charley, let's have the key."

"This is too bad," said "Charley," as he gave the robber the key.

"Not at all, my good fellow. You are doing a business on half a million of dollars capital, with enormous profits. You can't feel the loss of the fifteen thousand dollars in this box, while it will be a fortune to my 'boys.'"

With these words he unlocked the chest, and the contents soon found their way into the pockets of himself and his associate scoundrels. This done, he relocked the box, and tossed it back on the stage.

"Gentlemen," said he, as he mounted his horse, "you may now continue your journey, as soon as you are ready. (He had previously, we forgot to say, unharnessed the horses.) And I have the honor of wishing you a good day."

With a graceful salutation and wave of the hand, he touched his horse with his spur and disappeared, followed by his satellites. Now we call that a little bit of romance. We have given the story at second-hand, and from memory, but believe we have omitted no essential details. The second robbery of Lord Mauleverer, in Bulwer's "Paul Clifford," has nothing for this in coolness. The robber captain will doubtless perform other feats of the same description and end, like many a hero of the road by a "leap from a leafless tree."

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.—All persons in delicate health require a safe and effective tonic at this season of the year, but all those which combine in their preparation spirituous liquor should be carefully avoided. The Oxygenated Bitters are not only a mild and sure tonic, but one now universally conceded, is the remedy par excellence for dyspepsia, and the numerous diseases arising from a disordered state of the stomach and digestive organs, which are so generally prevalent. Prepared by S. W. Fowle & Co., Boston, and sold by druggists and agents everywhere.

MEN OF BRASS.

No more fatal mistake can be committed than that of telling aspiring young men that the great secret of success in the world is to have plenty of brass; that an exterior of brass compensates for the lack of brain, and is more of a universal currency than the gold of intellect and heart. Brass goes to a certain extent; but there is a limit to its progress; gold circulates everywhere. It is the standard and measure of value. We are, of course, speaking metaphorically, and alluding to men of head and heart, and not men of money. A face of brass may impose upon the superficial for a time, and in a certain sphere, but the base quality of the metal is sure to be discovered sooner or later. The great trouble is that the man of brass imposes on himself to a much greater extent than he does on the world at large. He can never become great, because he can never learn anything. Self-sufficiency is the essence of this flaunting, self-assertion. The man of brass knows everything at the outset, or thinks he knows everything. He considers himself capable of leading an army, of building a steamship, of being president of the United States, and this without studying tactics, mechanics or politics. Sometimes he forces himself into a "bad eminence," and then his shortcomings are glaringly apparent, and he "falls like Lucifer, never to rise again;" an awful warning to the whole tribe of impostors.

Let us not be understood as condemning self-reliance, which is a very different thing from self-sufficiency. No man of capacity need despair of attaining any eminence provided he has the will to study and qualify himself for the position. But men of this stamp are not men of brass; they are modest men, sensible of what they lack, making acquisitions of knowledge by slow degrees, and at each step perceiving the many more which must be taken before arriving at the goal.

Modesty is the most marked characteristic of men of worth and genius in every time of life. It was one of the most striking features in the peerless character of Washington. Every one remembers how he found himself incapable of making a reply to the compliment paid him by the legislature of his native State. General Garibaldi, whom we need not blush to name in the same paragraph with Washington, though brave as his sword, is remarkable for his modesty. It is your heroes of melo-drama who strut and swagger, and use big words, and fulminate thundering speeches on every pretext; the heroes of real life resemble the knight of chivalry "meek in his port as any maid." We were acquainted with an officer who performed the most signal services on our hardest-fought battle-fields, and yet who would absent himself from a public dinner when he was apprized that his bravery would be complimented. And another of our countrymen, who bore the stars and stripes into the very jaws of death, who is as much of a statesman as a soldier, is described by all his friends and acquaintances as "modest as a girl." Sir Walter Scott, one of the greatest literary men of this or any age, bore his honors meekly. We might multiply instances; but we should find it difficult to discover a single man of brass among the host of really great men, whose names adorn the muster-roll of time.

But among little men how many men of brass—small-beer politicians, rhymesters, penny-a-liners, quacks, pettifoggers, cowardly soldiers and sneaking dandies. That there are so many men of brass now-a-days only shows that there are few great men. Yet the very commonness of this brazen quality makes it cheap, and modesty actually attracts more attention, and is justly regarded as the sign of worth. So much so that some brazen varlets affect a virtue, if they have it not, and assume the guise of meekness as a passport of success. But it is as difficult for a brazen faced man to appear humble, as it is for a modest man to assume an air of effrontery, and he is forced to admit in the end that "honesty is the best policy."

WHAT BOSTON HAS DONE.—During the past fifteen years, the following sums have been contributed to charitable objects by the citizens of Boston: For religious objects, $1,220,726 71; charitable objects, 1,482,726 43; purposes of education, $2,055,709 46; monuments and statues, $168,784 50. Miscellaneous—such as the contributions to Ireland, Fayal, etc., during famine—$212,086 83; making a total, for the fifteen years, of $5,140,033 93.

ABSURD.—Louis Napoleon's idea of burying the Bonapartes beside the bones of the old kings of France, in St. Denis. The Bourbons and their victors should not rest in the same grave.

ILLINOIS.—The population of this State has more than doubled in the last ten years. This is shown by the census just taken.

GAS.—Nearly every town of any considerable population in New England, will soon be lighted by gas.

CHEAP ENOUGH.—In Green Bay, Wisconsin, butter sells for only ten cents per pound!

The potato disease has been ravaging the fields of the entire southern coasts of Ireland. The only hope for the crop existed in the fact that the dry weather might yet preserve it from destruction.

Galignani states that at a sale of autographs on the 4th of July, a letter written, dated and signed by the hand of Mary Stuart, and addressed to her good and dear mother, Catherine de Medicis, was knocked down at 222 francs.

A letter from Gotha states that it has been decided to send an expedition to Africa, to ascertain the fate of Dr. Vovel, the traveller. Baron Steuglin, of Wurtemberg, will undertake the voyage.

Of the ravaged Syrian towns, Damascus has a population of 120,000 inhabitants, Zahleh, before it was sacked, contained 11,000 souls, Deir el Kamir, 7000 (of whom two thousand are said to have been slain), Hasbeya, 6000, and Rashaia, 2500.

The larch forests of Scotland are threatened with destruction; of twenty-eight millions of larches planted by four land owners within a century, scarcely any remain alive. The failure is important, as no other timber is so well adapted for sleepers on railways as the larch.

Prof. Owen, one of the most distinguished naturalists in Great Britain, is now engaged in delivering a course of lectures upon the natural sciences, before Queen Victoria, her family, and attendants. This is a noble example, and shows what kind of knowledge is considered most important at the head of the English nation.

The sale of an American library in England—that of Mr. E. A. Crowninshield—attracted great attention. Some of the prices obtained were very good. Epistola, Christoferi Columbi, consisting of four leaves, and thought to be the first printed document relative to America, £30 10s.; a collection of caricatures, £92; Caxton's Chronicle, 1480, £180; Hulsius's Collection of Early Travels to the East, 1598–1650, £33.

SKETCHES IN RAHWAY, NEW JERSEY.

WE have devoted, from time to time, a considerable portion of our Magazine to illustrated sketches of American towns and cities, and the favor with which these have been received has induced us to continue the series in the present number. We shall first turn our attention to Rahway, N. J. It is situated upon the Rahway River, about four miles from Staten Island Sound, and is about twenty miles from New York, by the New Jersey Railroad. The first house was erected about the year 1720, and the place was settled principally by persons from Elizabethtown. There appears to be some confusion regarding the origin of the name given to the village. On an old map published previous to the Revolution, we find it laid down as "Spank-town;" while others say that the name Rahway was derived from an Indian chief, who resided on the site occupied by the village, and whose name was Rahwack. A branch of the river divides the town into Upper and Lower Rahway; and the county line, running along that branch, places the upper portion in the new county of Union (formerly part of Essex), and the lower portion in Middlesex. Lower Rahway was settled principally by Friends, or Quakers, and was at one time called Bridgetown. We had heard that "Spanktown" was the cognomen given to the lower town, from the fact that a drunken cobbler, who quarrelled with his wife, had used a shingle as a means of corporeal punishment. To our surprise, however, in turning over the pages of Irving's "Washington," we found the map alluded to, on which the whole town is designated by that title, and the name Rahway ignored. The population of the whole town, including the suburbs of Milton, Leesville, etc., which are "part and parcel" of the whole, is somewhere about 10,000. The site of Rahway ranges from northeast to southeast, with the river running west to east, and the railroad, which runs north and south, crosses the river, and entering Lower Rahway, leaves the upper town somewhat to the west of its track. Thus the depot is located in the lower town; and as the post-office, banks, etc., are all located here, the greater portion of the retail trade of the place concentrates in this vicinity. This gives rise to a jealousy of feeling between the two portions, which it is to be hoped the next legislature will effectually destroy by incorporating the whole into a city.

Of late years, Rahway has taken a start, which promises to place her side by side with her more populous sisters, Newark, Elizabeth and New Brunswick. The mill-dams, of which there were four in the precincts of the town, and which was supposed to be the prolific source of fever and ague, have been taken down at an expense to the tax-payers of nearly $35,000. A company has been incorporated for the introduction of gas into the streets and dwellings, and other improvements made and proposed, which will go far towards attracting the better class of the business men of New York to make their homes within her borders. Already there are large numbers of her citizens who do business in the "great emporium," and the trains in the mornings and evenings go and come filled with such. The distance is but twenty miles, and the time but an hour, including ferriage across the Hudson. This is but little more than what is required to reach the upper part of the island by means of the crowded and uncomfortable horse-cars and omnibuses; and business men are becoming every day more alive to the fact that they can enjoy all the pleasures and comforts of living in the country, free from the turmoil, dust and mud of the city, at the same time that they reach their places of business by the time they have finished their morning paper. So rapid has been the growth of the empire city, that warehouses are rapidly encroaching upon the private residences, and the merchant who builds his store upon the site of his house, is driven to find a home in the suburban towns and villages. Newark, Elizabeth, and a hundred others which we could name, have felt the influence of this exodus, and Rahway is receiving her share. There are here two Presbyterian, two Methodist, one Episcopal, one Baptist, one Catholic, and one colored church, besides Friends' meeting-houses, and an Unitarian society about organizing. Of public and private schools there are quite a number. The "Rahway Library Association and Free Reading-Room" is an institution recently started by some of the enterprising citizens of the place.

Rahway is supported chiefly by its manufactures, the principal of which is carriage-making in all its branches. Vast numbers of carriages of every conceivable style and pattern are made here for the Southern market. A large amount of ready-made clothing also goes South from this place. There are foundries, potteries, saw and grist mills, machine shops, a factory for fulling cloth and making satinetts, etc., all of which are doing a good business, and afford employment to large numbers of the inhabitants. Abraham Clark, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born in the immediate neighborhood of Rahway, and lies buried in the cemetery of the First Presbyterian Church. A tall but plain shaft marks the spot where rest his mortal remains. An artist correspondent of ours, writing from Rahway, in 1857, says:—"There is a ghost in every house, they say, and Rahway is not without its dark spot and blemish. I would that I could pass over the subject without mention; but feel compelled to call the attention of her citizens to the fact, that that which should prove her brightest honor, is made her lasting disgrace, for the lack of public spirit. I allude to the circumstance that one of America's noblest painters lies sepulchred in our midst, with no stone to mark his resting-place. It may be that I am oversensitive, professionally. It may be so; but I must confess that, when I was shown an humble mound in St. Paul's cemetery, without even a stake to designate it as the grave of some of the brightest hopes and the tomb of a lofty ambition—when I was told that beneath lay the remains of Henry Inman, I confess that the blood of indignation suffused my face, and words of evil import passed my lips. Not for his sake would I have the lofty marble erected. No, no; the towering shaft could add nothing to his fame—that is already world-wide, and lasting as time. But for our own honor, and for the sake of posterity, who will seek with anxious eyes for the spot where his form is enshrined, would I have it designated by an imposing monument. It will be the sorrow of a future age, and the disgrace of the present, that we knew not how to appreciate genius such as his. The warrior, who slays his thousands, and is the cause of misery to countless myriads of the human race, is entombed beneath the magnificent architectural pile; while he, whose mission 'twas to soften the heart and enlighten the minds of his fellow-men by brilliant conceptions of the beautiful, and who faithfully performed that mission, lies buried like a dog. Alas, that it is so! I trust that our citizens may wash out this stain by a fitting monument to the memory of Henry Inman. Let them show to posterity that they knew how to appreciate him." We know not whether the wish of our artist friend has been gratified by the erection of a monument.

The subjects of the first and last engravings in this series are the residences of A. C. Watson and of J. R. Shotwell, Esquires, pretty specimens of the domestic architecture of the town of which we are treating. The residence of A. C. Watson, Esq., stands upon Milton Avenue, facing Fourth Street, and is encompassed by every variety of fruit and ornamental trees and shrubbery. Mr. Shotwell's residence, on the left; has been recently finished at an immense expense, and is probably one of the most complete and thoroughly finished residences in the State of New Jersey. His grounds have not yet assumed the beautiful appearance which time alone can give them, although he has devoted large sums in transplanting full grown deciduous trees for the benefit of shade and ornament. The building is of brick, stuccoed. The view of the First Presbyterian Church will be recognized at once by every citizen as well as by the casual visitor. Its spire is a landmark for miles around, and is the first, most prominent object seen in approaching the town from any direction. This is the oldest congregation in Rahway, the first place of worship being erected by a union of Episcopalians and Presbyterians about 1742. The church grew and flourished until the commencement of the Revolution, but during the period of that severe struggle it languished. The situation of Rahway made it a post of considerable danger, as the whole country was harassed by incursions of the British troops from Staten Island. The pastor was absent through the pressure of the times for years, and the congregation became scattered. After the close of the war, however, the church resumed its wonted prosperity, which has never since departed. Several entire congregations have withdrawn from it, and yet in point of numbers it is full. The present edifice was erected in 1831, and such has been the increase in the congregation since that period, that it is proposed to enlarge it to accommodate the growth. Its present pastor is Rev. S. S. Shedden. The Episcopal Church (St. Paul's), is shown in another of our engravings. The rear view was taken for the purpose of showing the parsonage, which is opposite. The edifice is of comparatively recent erection, and the congregation a flourishing one.

We have given a view of the bank, it being among the "institutions" of Rahway, without which the town would be completely at a loss. A charter was granted by the legislature in 1828, for a capital of $100,000, and the institution was re-chartered in 1845, with a capital increased to $200,000. The neat and substantial building shown in the engraving serves the double purpose of a residence for the cashier and an office for banking purposes. Rahway is both a busy and a delightful place. Many of its private residences are beautiful, and the grounds about them laid out with exquisite taste. The Main street is a broad and commodious avenue, with well-built stores and houses on each side, and gives the stranger a very favorable impression of the character of the place.

LIVES OF RELIGIOUS REFORMERS.

No great man's biography requires so much aid from the graduated perspective and mellow shading which a distant stand-point affords the biographer, as that of a great religious reformer. None in his lifetime takes wider or stronger hold than he on the tempestuous passions of his time; none is more ardently glorified by his disciples, or more unscrupulously besmirched by his opponents; and it is not until somewhat of the harshness and exaggeration of the tumultuous elements in which he wrought as a living man has been blended and smoothed out by the creeping tide of centuries, that we can credit him with anything like his true balance of good and evil, or draw anything like a faithful outline of his moral and intellectual characteristics from the garbled portraiture handed down to us by contemporary friends or foes.—Athenaeum.

The ambition which aims too moderately, is quite as liable to defeat as that which aims too low. The eagle finds the sheep a better mark than he would the moth.—Simms.

THE HONEYMOON.

The origin of this word is so little known, and yet so highly and generally interesting, that we are constrained to give an account of it. It is traceable to a Teutonic origin. Among the Teutons was a favorite drink called metheglin. It was made of honey, and much like the present mead of the same name in European countries. The same beverage was in use among the Saxons, as well as another, morat, which was also made of honey, but flavored with mulberries. The honeyed drinks were used in great abundance at festivals. Among the nobility the marriage was celebrated a whole lunar month, which was called a moon, during which the festival board was well supplied with the honey drink. Hence this month of festival was called the honah moon, or honeymoon, which means a festival. The famous Alaric is said to have died on his wedding-night, from the effects of too much indulgence in metheglin.—New York Day Book.

A BUSY MAN.

The late Dr. Alexander, while pastor of a church in Charlotte county, Va., tells us the following was then his daily routine: Rise at 4, shower-bath, dress, shave, a walk or exercise in the garden, family prayers at six, breakfast quarter before 7, read Scriptures, a lesson in Hebrew, Greek Testament in course with commentaries, Old Testament with commentaries, cursory reading of Greek Testament, English Bible, preparation for sermons, theology, German; I have luncheon at 11, dinner at half-past 2; after dinner I expatiate, read everything, ride, walk, lie on the grass, etc.

DISCOVERY OF PHOSPHORUS.

It is now nearly two centuries since Brandt, the Hamburgh alchemist, in his search for gold, accidentally discovered the elementary body phosphorus, named from its property of being luminous in the dark, from two Greek words—phos, light, and phero, I bear. Within two years of this discovery, or, in 1670, one Kraft brought a small piece of phosphorus to London, and showed it to Charles II. and his queen, the year after peace was concluded with Holland. The Hon. Robert Boyle afterwards discovered the process, which he described in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1680, and in a small work which he published in the same year, entitled "The Aerial Noctiluca." Mr. Boyle instructed Mr. Godfrey Hankwitz, of London, how to procure phosphorus from urine, so that he was the first who made it for sale in England; and he is said to have supplied all Europe with it for many years. It continued long to be an expensive chemical; for in 1731, we find by the books of the Royal Society that for Dr. Probenias's experiments on the transmutation of phosphorus, exhibited before the Prince of Wales, the phosphorus used on the occasion, amounting to six ounces, cost ten guineas!—Timbs's "Curiosities of Science."

VICTORIA BRIDGE AT MONTREAL.

The Victoria Bridge is one of the wonders of the world. It crosses the river from Point St. Charles to the south shore—a distance of two miles, less 150 feet. It is built on the tubular principle, and, while the railway trains pass through the tube, there is a balcony outside, with a footpath for passengers. The bridge consists of twenty-three spans of 242 feet each, and one in the centre of the river of 330 feet. The spans are approached on each side of the river by a causeway, each terminating in an abutment of solid masonry, 240 feet long, and 90 wide. The causeway from the north bank is 1400 feet long, that from the south bank is 700 feet. The tube is iron, 22 feet high, and 16 feet wide; at the extreme ends, 19 feet high, 16 feet wide. The contents of the masonry are three million cubic feet. This is necessary, as it is calculated that each buttress will have to bear the pressure of 70,000 tons of ice, when the winter breaks up, and large ice-fields come sweeping down the St. Lawrence, which have destroyed former bridges. The Grand Trunk Railway system now consists of a continuous line of nearly 1200 miles, between Chicago, the emporium of the West, and the Atlantic seaboard at Quebec and Portland.—Boston Post.

The richest endowments of the mind are temperance, prudence and fortitude. Prudence is a universal virtue, which enters into the composition of all the rest; and where she is not, fortitude loses its name and nature.

A DEAD SHOT.

An interesting account is given in the eleventh number of the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, of the Jaculator fish of Java, by a gentleman who had an opportunity of examining some specimens of it in the possession of a chief. The fish were placed in a small circular pond, from the centre of which projected a pole upwards of two feet in height and at the top of this pole were inserted several small pieces of wood, sharpened at the points, on each of which were transfixed some insects of the beetle tribe. When all had become quiet, after the beetles had been secured, the fish, which had retired during the operation, came out of their hiding-places, and began to circle round the pond. One of them at length rose to the surface of the water, and after steadily fixing its eyes for some time upon an insect, discharged from its mouth a small quantity of water-like fluid, with such force and precision of aim, as to drive the beetle off the twig into the water, where it was instantly swallowed. After this, another came and performed a similar feat, and was followed by the rest, till all the insects had been devoured. The writer observed, that if a fish failed in bringing down its prey at the first shot, it swam round the pond until it again came opposite the same object, and fired again. In one instance he remarked one of the fish return three times to the attack before it secured its prey; but in general they seemed to be very expert shot, bringing down the game at the very first discharge. The jaculator, in a state of nature, frequents the banks of rivers in search of food. When it spies a fly settling on the plants that grow in shallow water, it swims on to the distance of four or five feet off them, and then, with surprising dexterity, ejects from its tubular mouth a single drop of fluid, which rarely fails to strike the fly into the water, where it is immediately swallowed.—Cuthbertson Fish and Fishing.

SKETCHES IN DUBUQUE, IOWA.

POST-OFFICE AND ODD FELLOWS' HALL, DUBUQUE.

The city of Dubuque has become a place of so much importance within a few years, and its advantages, both natural and artificial, for becoming one of the principal cities of the United States are so great, that all our readers will probably be pleased with the series of faithful representations of some of its prominent features presented on the three pages now open before them. From the small mining hamlet of 1830, Dubuque has risen to be a city of nearly 20,000 inhabitants, owning upwards of $10,000,000 of property, with fine public and private buildings, churches, schools, and institutions, indicating a remarkable progressive wealth, mental culture, and social enjoyment. Dubuque owes its origin as a city to the discovery of lead ore somewhere near its present locality by the squaw of an Indian named Peosta—so at least, tradition says. At that early period (1788) a few scattered white men dwelt upon the banks of the Mississippi, at intervals of several hundred miles apart. Among the first who received information of the discovery, and who availed himself of it, by commencing mining operations, was a Frenchman named Julien Dubuque. Dubuque derived his privilege from the Indians, over whom he obtained great influence, and by whom he was elected a chieftain, with the designation of "Little Night." In thirty years or so, subsequent to the discovery of lead on the Mississippi, the prestige of Dubuque's name was not lost, and the American settlers who arrived at the mines in 1830, designated the place by common consent, and without much apparent concert of action, as the Dubuque mines, and by this name the place was known for several years afterwards. The flourishing city under consideration appropriately bears the name of the most distinguished white settler. The view of the Odd Fellows' Hall, the first picture in our series, was drawn for us from a very beautiful daguerreotype, taken by Messrs. Frank Pickershell & Brother, superior artists and residents of Dubuque. The corner stone of this handsome hall was laid by the Grand Lodge I. O. O. F., in the month of October, 1855. The Odd Fellows' Hall Association was organized April, 1856, with a capital of $100,000. The new hall is 110 feet in length, 96 feet in width, and three stories high above the basement. The lower story is occupied by four very handsome and commodious stores and by the post-office. The second story of the eastern half of the block is devoted to offices of various kinds, all the rooms being capacious and airy. Above these business rooms are the Odd Fellows' Hall, and Masonic Lodge Room, both of which are 30 by 50 feet, and 18 feet in height, in every way well adapted for the purposes to which they are devoted. The second story of the western half of the block has been fitted up in a magnificent style for theatrical purposes, known as the People's Theatre. The stage is 64 feet wide and 40 deep, and the entire length of the theatre, 96 feet by 64, and 35 in height, with two tiers of boxes. The auditorium is fitted up with all the modern improvements. The two views of Main Street will give our readers a correct idea of the architecture as well as of the character and business movement of Dubuque. Our artist has faithfully copied the minutiae of the locality, showing the signs of the stores, and every particular of graphic detail. In the "up town" view, the building in the distance, surmounted by a flag, is a new hotel, which has been fitted up in the completest and costliest manner, rivalling similar establishments in the older cities of the east. The northern portion of the city, including the suburbs, has been rapidly built upon for several years past, and contains a large number of very desirable situations for residences. No stranger, visiting Dubuque either for pleasure or business, should fail to visit the lead mines. The mines are supposed to be inexhaustible, and when speculation in real estate will have come down to the ordinary remunerative profits yielded by other branches of industry, the lead mines will be resorted to as an unfailing source of profit. Dubuque needs but capital properly invested in industrial pursuits to make her a great city. Her situation on the Mississippi River, navigable for large steamboats during at least seven months of the year, gives her commercial access to St. Louis and New Orleans, and furnishes her merchants with a great channel of trade to supply the river counties of Northern Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota with the products of the South and her own and eastern manufactures. Her position as a railroad city will give her control of a country trade possessed by no other city in the Union, not even by

Chicago herself, for there is no such back country contributing to the prosperity of any city in the United States as that which extends westward and northward from Dubuque. Her mineral wealth is inestimably valuable, and this alone is to her so reliable a source of profit, so certain a basis of prosperity, that without the aid of any extraneous circumstances Dubuque would become a city of no mean importance. With this resource, added to her natural and acquired advantages, what is Dubuque not likely to become! Progress has made its mark upon her every feature, and time has only added new charms to her original beauty. From the small hamlet of 1833 she has extended for miles; the bluffs which surrounded her original limits have not been able to bound her growth. And while the surrounding country possesses so many scenes of charming variety, and there are so many avenues of wealth opening for the enterprising, this city cannot but be a nucleus of power and influence. And so of all our western cities, the late census showing vast aggregations of population and social power.

SKETCHES IN ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.

We present herewith a series of fine views drawn expressly for us, illustrating the flourishing city of St. Paul, the capital of Minnesota. St. Paul is pleasantly situated on the east bank of the Mississippi River, eight miles from the Falls of St. Anthony, and five miles from Fort Snelling; about two thousand and seventy miles from the mouth of the Mississippi River, and near its confluence with the Minnesota River, and is elevated about eight hundred feet above the Gulf of Mexico. It is near the geographical centre of the continent of North America, in the north temperate zone, and must eventually become a central nucleus for the business of one of the best watered, timbered, and most fertile countries on the globe. It is surrounded in the rear by a semi-circular plateau, elevated about forty feet above the town, of easy grade, and commanding a magnificent view of the river above and below. Nature never planned a spot better adapted to build up a showy and delightful display of architecture and gardening, than that natural terrace of hills. St. Paul occupies perhaps the most eligible and commanding, and also one of the most beautiful locations on the Upper Mississippi. Commercially, it is the key to all the vast region north of it, and, by the Minnesota River, to the immense valley drained through that important tributary to the Father of Waters. The approach to it by the river from below is grand and imposing. The town site is high and conspicuous, being elevated from seventy to eighty feet above the water at common stages. The central part embraces an extensive level plateau, terminating along the Mississippi, in a precipitous bluff. This bluff, after running for some distance, recedes from the river on the east and west, and by assuming a gradual ascent, forms two commodious landings called the Upper and Lower Town, meeting upon the elevated plateau of the central part. The site upon which the Lower Town is mostly built, is several feet below the central and upper parts, and has quite a sandy soil, while the higher portions are on a limestone formation, lying above the sandstone. Much of the sandstone is nearly as white as loaf sugar, and is said to be of a superior quality for the manufacturing of glass. In the rear of St. Paul, or on the north, rises another bluff or line of hills, which encircle the town site, in the shape of an amphitheatre, bending gradually until they approach quite near the river again toward Fort Snelling on the southwest, and toward Lake Pepin on the southeast. These smooth and beautiful hills, extending from one-half a mile to upward of two miles from the town, afford many most delightful situations for country-seats and farms. There are also several small lakes in the vicinity supplied by springs, and situated much higher than St. Paul, which can be made to supply a large city with excellent water. Every day makes it clearer, that St. Paul is destined to more importance as a city than the most sanguine have dared to anticipate. Not only has it already become, in the few years of its existence, the emporium of trade for all that vast area of trade above it, extending from the shore of Lake Superior to the headwaters of the Missouri—a trade yet limited, to be sure, but hourly increasing, and which must soon become incalculably great. As a specimen of the church architecture, we have presented a view of the First Presbyterian Church, a very handsome structure. Another fine specimen of the architecture of St. Paul is the Capitol, the details of which are given with such minute-in a measure, a public benefactor, and to proceed forthwith to the work of erecting a hotel building which, in regard to expense, durability, imposing appearance, comfort, and all the conveniences which go to make complete the most fashionable of modern hotels, has scarcely its equal in the Valley of the Upper Mississippi. The Fuller House has been leased to Stephen Long, Esq., who, assisted by his brother, E. H. Long, both gentlemen of experience, make it in every respect a first class hotel, vieing with the most celebrated establishments of the great cities on the Atlantic. Every comfort and elegance are provided, and the traveller here finds a most luxurious home, a hospitable table, and the best attenness as to obviate the necessity of a verbal description. Another picture will probably surprise our Eastern readers—the view of the Fuller House; for we fancy few among them were prepared to find an establishment of such magnitude in a city of such recent origin. This noble building was erected at a cost of $100,000. This hotel was not erected on the usual principle of a joint stock company, but it was determined to raise a large bonus among the citizens, to be presented to competent and responsible persons who should undertake the work. There was no promise of remuneration, for years, in the character of building that it was proposed to erect, even with this bonus; but in Alpheus Fuller, Esq., the planners of the enterprise found a man willing to become, tion. The Fuller House stands at the corner of Jackson and Seventh Streets, a short distance from, and in full view of the principal steamboat landings, in close proximity to the busiest part of the city, and commanding a fine view of the river for a distance of six miles. The main building has a front of one hundred and twenty-feet on Jackson Street, the same on Seventh Street, and is five stories in height. The main building is a quadrangle with an area in the centre. The dining-room is 70 feet by 40, and so arranged that it will seat 300 persons. The house in all, numbers over 200 rooms.

There are many interesting places in the neighborhood of St. Paul, one of the most attractive of which is the celebrated Falls of St. Anthony, about eight miles distant. In the "Annals of the Minnesota Historical Society for 1856," we find the following interesting notice of these falls: "This fall was not named by a Jesuit, as Willard says in his History of the United States, but by a Franciscan of the Recollect order. He saw it while returning from Mille Lac, in the month of July, and named, after his patron saint, Anthony of Padua. In the last edition of his travels, the adventurous father says, 'navigation is interrupted by a fall which I called St. Anthony of Padua's, in gratitude for the favors done me by the Almighty through the intercession of that great saint, whom we had chosen patron and protector of all our enterprises. This fall is forty or fifty feet high, divided in the middle by a rocky island of pyramidal form.' As Hennepin was passing the fall, in company with a party of Dakota buffalo hunters, he perceived a Dakota up in an oak opposite the great fall weeping bitterly, with a well-dressed beaver robe, whitened inside, and trimmed with porcupine quills, which in itself is admirable and frightful. He heard him while shedding copious tears say, as he spoke to the great cataract: 'Thou who art a spirit, grant that our nation may pass her quietly without accident, may kill buffalo in abundance, conquer our enemies, and bring in slaves, some of whom we will put to death before thee; the Mes-senequz (to this day the Dakotas call the Fox Indians by this name) have killed our kindred, grant that we may avenge them.' The only other European, during the time of the French dominion, whose account of the falls is preserved, was Charleville. He told Du Pratz, the author of a history of Louisiana, that, with two Canadians and two Indians, in a birch canoe laden with goods, he proceeded as far as the Falls of St. Anthony. This cataract he describes as caused by a flat rock, which forms the bed of the river, and causing a fall of eight or ten feet. It was not far from a century after Hennepin saw the 'curling waters,' that it was gazed upon by a British subject. Jonathan Carver, a native of Connecticut, and captain of a provincial troop, was the Yankee who first looked on this valuable water-power, and began to make calculations for further settlement. His sketch of the falls was the first ever taken, and was well engraved in London. He visited them in November, 1766, and his description of the surrounding scenery is very much the same as that given by modern writers: 'The country around is extremely beautiful. It is not an uninterrupted plain, where the eye finds no relief, but composed of many gentle ascents, which in the summer are covered with the finest verdure, and interspersed with little groves, that give a pleasing variety to the prospect. On the whole, when the falls are included, which may be seen at a distance of four miles, a more pleasing and picturesque view cannot, I believe, be found throughout the universe.' Carver, like Hennepin, speaks of a rocky island dividing the falls, and estimates its 'width about forty feet, and its length not much more, and about half way between this island and the eastern shore, is a rock, lying at the very edge of the fall, that appeared to be about five or six feet broad, and thirty feet long.'

"During the two generations that have since elapsed, some changes have taken place in the appearance of the falls. It is more than probable that in an age long passed, they were once in the vicinity of Fort Snelling. In the course of two years it has receded many feet. The number of pine logs that pitch over falls have increased the recession. As the logs float down they are driven into the fissures, and serve as levers, other logs and the water communicating the power, to wrench the limestone slabs from their localities. In time the falls will recede until they become nothing more than rapids. There are two islands of great beauty in the rapids above the falls. The first juts out some feet beyond the falls, and contains about fifteen acres. It is now generally known as Hennepin Island, in accordance with the following suggestion, in an address before the Historical Society of Minnesota, January 1st, 1850: 'As a town in the State of Illinois has already taken the name of Hennepin, which would have been so appropriate for the beautiful village of Saint Anthony, we take leave of the discoverer of these picturesque falls, which will always render that town attractive to the eye of the poet and capitalist, by suggesting that the island which divides the laughing water be called Hennepin.' A few yards above Hennepin is Nicollet Island, named after a distinguished man of science, who has done as much as any man in developing the resources of Minnesota. It contains about forty acres, and is one of the most delightful spots for a summer residence. About the middle of the island, 'a small bluff rises some ten or fifteen feet high,' with a slope rounded as if by the hand of art, which seems waiting for a handsome mansion. The little island once within, but now just below the falls, is called the Spirit Island. The Dakota legend saith, that in the mist of the morning, the spirit of an Indian wife, with a child clinging around her neck, is seen darting in a canoe through the spray, and that the sound of her death-song is heard moaning in the winds, and in the war of the waters."

There are two settlements here, one on the east side, named after the great cataract, and the other, Minneapolis, a thriving place, the seat of justice for the county of Hennepin, and the location of a United States land-office. Six miles from Minneapolis are the Falls of Ha-Ha, of which the authority just quoted says: "These, within a few months, have obtained a world-wide reputation, from the fact that 'a certain one of our own poets' has given the name of Minne-ha-ha to the wife of Hiawatha. Longfellow, in his vocabulary, says: 'Minne-ha-ha — Laughing water; a waterfall or a stream running into the Mississippi, between Fort Snelling and the Falls of St. Anthony.' All waterfalls in the Dakota tongue are called Ha-ha, never Minne-ha-ha. The 'h' has a strong guttural sound, and the word is applied because of the curling of the waters. The verb I-ha-ha primarily means to curl; secondarily to laugh, because of the curling motion of the mouth in laughter. The noise of Ha-ha is called by the Dakotas I-ha-ha, because of its resemblance to laughter."

Altogether the city of St. Paul is a most interesting place. In beauty of location it is scarcely surpassed, in attractiveness of surroundings it yields to none. The rapidity with which the elements of prosperity have been here developed is a guaranty of its future growth and greatness. Here are found all the comforts and luxuries of life—the interests of humanity, religion, education, are here fostered; here the press labors in its great mission, and the people, animated by a high spirit, press on to the realization of a splendid future for their beautiful city. Its prosperity and enlarged influence is a matter of certainty.

DANISH COSTUMES.

The pictures we now publish represent some of the striking costumes of the peasants of Denmark. National costumes are always interesting, and it is much to be regretted that one consequence of the regular and rapid intercommunication between states and cities in modern times is to banish distinctive national costumes, and clothe all mankind in whatever garb the tailors and milliners of France see fit to sanction. We regret that the graceful garb of the Scottish Highlanders only survives in some of the regiments of the British army, while we are exceedingly obliged to King Otho of Greece for rendering the Albanian dress, that Lord Byron was so proud of, fashionable. Our illustrations of Danish costumes are from reliable authorities. Two of the figures wear peasants' dresses from Laso, an island situated in the Kattegat.

SUNDAY DRESS, FINIR.

EVERYDAY DRESS, LÄSO.

One is a Sunday dress, consisting of a cambric handkerchief as head-gear; a black velvet bodice, under which is a small waistcoat laced with a silver chain; the four large buttons on the bodice are also of silver—sometimes the two upper ones are even of gold. The skirt and apron are of rich brocade silk, the skirt generally of light blue, and the apron lilac, yellow or white. The other figure wears a week-day dress. The head-dress is larger, of home-made linen, with fringe. The bodice is of blue cloth, the skirt of a green woolen stuff, made by the peasants themselves; and the apron is of gingham. The island of Kattegat is quite flat. As peculiarities may be named, every house has its own small windmill and high flag-stand, employed for signals. The houses are thatched with seaweed, from four to five feet thick; the top of the roof is flat, and is used as a look-out. The inhabitants live from fishing and shipwrecks; the cultivation of land is not regarded, and principally attended to by the females. The third figure wears a Sunday dress from Finir, a small island in the Liim-Fjærd. The dress consists of home-made coarse cloth; the hair is worn long, but formerly the custom was to wear it much longer. The island is known in the old history of Denmark, and many fabulous tales about elves and fairies are connected with it, and still believed by the poorer classes. On the island is found an immense stone, with a hollow like an entrance, whence the elves and fairies are said to come forth in the night. Fourthly is a bride from Fano, an island situated on the southwest coast of Jutland. Her dress is of black cloth, trimmed with gold and silver ribbons. It is remarkable that the females only on their wedding-day show their hair; it is considered a shame for a woman to show her hair to a man before or after that day; wherever they go, they always wear a tightly-bound handkerchief over their head, and even sleep with it.

HOLIDAY DRESS, LÆSØ.

The island is flat; towards the German Ocean are the renowned sandhills (sandklitter). The peasants of the other parts of Denmark are an honest, hardy, cheerful race, with a plentiful sufficiency of Teutonic phlegm. They cling closely to old customs as well as to old costumes, and never ride in a railroad car when they can travel on a treckschuyt, or canal-boat—a covered boat, divided into two compartments. On the forward one baggage, butter, herrings and poor passengers are stowed; in the second are the more aristocratic class who can pay more, where also are the helmsman and the pilot. At the extremity is a long rope drawn by a meagre horse carrying on his back a little fellow with a tin trumpet in the form of a hunting-horn. This simple craft makes some league and a half an hour. Denmark is full of interest to the traveller who desires to go a little out of the beaten track to see a people who, amidst the hurry of modern times, cling tenaciously to the traditions of the past.

JULIAN AND I.

BY MARY J. CROSMAN.

Mid gladness our life-path led onward,
And none were so happy as we;
Bright blossoms were nodding in beauty,
And soft winds swept over the sea.

One time to our hearts came a sorrow,
Which, thornlike, brought anguish and pain;
But each wiped the brow of the other,
And spake of true comfort again.

True love was the magic that lightened
The burdens each pilgrim must bear;
That sweetened the draught of the life-cup,
And silvered the clouds of dull care.

But once when the glories of sunset
Their beams on our pathway had thrown,
"O Alice!" said he, "I must leave you
To finish life's journey alone!"

Then thick closed the shadows around me,
And nought could a ray of hope bring,
Till I saw, mid the shadows of earth-land,
The gleam of a heavenly wing.

And now, as I look o'er the river
That borders the bright promised land,
I fancy there waiteth to guide me
A spotless, an unerring hand.

BY GUSSEIN LAURIN.

CHAPTER I.

IN Cordova, in the early part of the fifteenth century, in a humble cot, two happy parents were rejoicing over the advent of a little stranger. For many years of wedded life had this boon been denied. Madame Vodisco had long prayed for the "crown of woman's glory—the blessing of a child." At last her prayers had been answered, and a cherub daughter smiled upon her love. Two happy hearts were there in Cordova. Though their home was lowly, though a tyrant ruled the land, though their goods were heavily taxed, they were happy, for nowhere could be seen such a beautiful babe. Their cup of joy seemed full. Proud parents were they, when one sunny Sabbath morning they passed up the aisle of the little village church, to the baptismal font, and the father placed the smiling babe in the arms of Father Franchesco, who dedicated then and there to the service of the most high God, the little Onorata Vodisco. The child was of uncommon beauty. The seal of intellect seemed set upon that baby brow, and the blue eyes ever wandered heavenward, as if receiving light therefrom.

Ferdinand, the only son of the haughty Lord De Castro, was a frequent visitor to the cottage of the Vodiscos, which was situated not far distant from the lofty castle of which he was sole heir. He never wearied of sounding the praises of Onorata, till at length his lady mother, out of curiosity, had ordered her coachman to set her down at the door of Carlos Vodisco. Ferdinand was delighted. Of a buoyant, loving disposition, he was ever ready for amusement, which he could never be contented to enjoy alone, and thus it was his mother must also know and love his sweet pet. Ferdinand was but six years of age, a manly little fellow, whose aristocratic features were brightened by sparkling eyes and shaded by clustering, jetty curls. The spirited horses had scarcely stopped, ere the footman had time to open the coach, the impatient lad had performed that office, and with a bounce was in the cottage, leaving Lady De Castro to find her way as best she might.

"Where's baby? Where's Ona? My mother has come to see her!" were the words which greeted the ear of Madame Vodisco, and full of confusion, she arose to receive her titled guest.

"You do me great honor, lady; please to have a seat." Saying which she wiped a chair with her apron, and passed it to Lady De Castro.

"My son is a little rude, I fear. He has insisted that I should come to see your little daughter. I cannot stay to sit. Allow me to see the wonder."

"My lady, Ona is sleeping now; if you will come this way, I can show her to you as she is."

She led the way into an adjoining room, where upon a low couch, smiling at her baby dreams, lay the tiniest, sweetest rosebud of a babe Lady De Castro thought she had ever seen. In mute admiration for a time she bent over the couch, then her delight found words to express itself.

"The little darling! precious little one! Ferdinand has not said half enough in your praise." Turning to the mother, "Do you know I envy you? I, Lady De Castro, envy you this treasure. May I hope to see it often? You will bring her to the castle, will you not? And I will sometimes come here."

Tears of gratitude filled the eyes of Madame Vodisco, as she stammered forth thanks for this condescension.

Ferdinand must needs have a look at Ona, so brushing past his mother, he imprinted a hearty kiss upon her plump little cheek. Ona's eyes opened wide at this liberty which the embryo lord had so unceremoniously taken, and a faint cry of astonishment parted her tiny lips.

"My son, how rude! Dear little one, you are frightened, aren't you, darling?" And Ona's head was pillowed upon the folds of costly lace which covered the kind heart of Lady De Castro.

This elegantly apparelled lady, rocking that tiny babe to sleep as gently as if she were her own, humming a low, sweet melody; Ferdinand kneeling by her side, his bright face upturned; the mother standing near, with a corner of her apron to her eye, wiping the tears of joy—the curious blending in that lowly room of splendor and tidy poverty—all this formed a picture so beautiful and so strange that the eyes of Lord De Castro were dimmed with moisture, as standing in the outer room, he had been an interested spectator of the scene. He had followed his lady to the cottage, as he had business of importance to communicate to her. Ferdinand was the first on the move to discover the intruder.

"O, father, I am so glad you are come. I want you to see Ona. Come!"

"Willingly, my son."

He came and knelt on the other side of his lady, looked with eyes of love and admiration upon the babe and its aristocratic nurse. The picture had received a noble addition. Lady De Castro, seated with the babe upon her breast; Lord De Castro, gracefully kneeling on the right, his noble features all aglow with admiration; their handsome boy on the left, the midnight curls shading his face; Madame Vodiesco, with her happy face and matronly form, standing at a respectful distance; the low couch, with its snowy sheets; the open casement, through which the honeysuckle came peeping in, with its myriad blossoms, giving out delicious perfume; the morning sunlight, beautifying it all, formed a picture which the little Onorata's pencil immortalized years after, and which now hangs in the ancient castle of R——, which stands near where the Guadalquivir rushes to the embrace of the sea.

Lord and Lady De Castro never ceased to be the friends of Onorata, and valuable ones they proved to be. When, as the child grew in years, and they discovered her wonderful genius for painting, they employed for her the best masters to be found in Europe, and spared no expense to give her every advantage. At the age of sixteen, she lost both her parents by a fearful epidemic. Thus being left quite alone, her noble patrons offered her a home in the castle, where she divided her time with her masters and Ferdinand for two years. Being thus from early childhood much in each other's society, what wonder that the two loved each other with all the strength of their natures! They dreamed of no obstacle, and thus blindly loved on. The promises of increased loveliness we have seen in their youth, were fulfilled. The young Lord Ferdinand and Signora Onorata were very beautiful.

CHAPTER II.

ALL Cordova was alive with excitement, for in a few weeks there was to be a brilliant tournament and bullfight, under the direction of Marquis Gabrino Fandolo. It was the chief topic of conversation in castles and cottages; in doors and out, nothing was thought of but the coming festivities.

The marquis, who delighted in such sports, had made expensive preparations. On the first day there would be a tournament, in which the pride and flower of Spanish chivalry would strive to win the laurel wreath from the hands of the queen of beauty. Ferdinand was to take part, and his heart beat high, his blood flowed fiercely, as he, in imagination, should stand in the midst of that vast enclosure, sole victor of the day. Then would he take the wreath from the Countess Annie, of Saragossa, and placing it in the hands of his chosen queen of beauty, his Onorata, kneeling there, let her fair hands crown him with the wreath so fairly won.

The second day was to be the crowning feature of the festivities, the celebrated bullfight, upon which with intense interest would gaze the stalwart warrior and the tender maiden. Onorata looked forward to this day with feverish anxiety, for the Marquis Gabrino had engaged her to sketch the scene. Here would be a subject rich with incident, upon which, with all the gorgeousness of the style peculiar to herself, she could let her fancy play; now painting in fierce glow the burning eyes of the animal, then with a milder shade, the eyes of the beauties of Spain in the pavilion around.

At last the wished-for day arrived. The town was wild with excitement. From every housetop fluttered gay streamers, and across the streets were stretched fanciful arches, with patriotic mottoes, significant of the day. Young men were hurrying to and fro, with the colors of their lady-love fastened to their right arms; love charms they were to strengthen them in that day's combat.

At last the crowd had settled around a circular enclosure beneath pavilions hung with scarlet and gold. In a place commanding the best view, on a throne of crimson velvet, ornamented with gold fringe, sat Annie, Countess of Saragossa, the maiden selected by the marquis as queen of the tournament. She was clothed in a light blue robe trimmed with ermine. Her fair neck and arms were sparkling with jewels. A tiara of diamonds rested like a glory upon her head. She was very beautiful, but a look of sadness dimmed her eye, for she had noticed with pain that the young Lord Ferdinand, whom she had long loved, had no eyes save for the artist maiden; that the fair Onorata held a place in his heart she would give the world to possess. The Marquis of Cordova, with his family, and the nobility of the country round occupied the seats on her right. The judges, who were to decide upon the affairs of the day, sat in grave silence on the left. Directly in front, in a place from whence she could sketch with the greatest advantage, with her easel before her, palette in hand, was Onorata. The fire of genius lighted her eye, as she rapidly noticed the objects of interest before her.

The heralds sounded the trumpets. A mounted horseman rode rapidly into the enclosure. He was clothed from head to heel in flexible mail, steel gauntlets upon his hands, sandals of the same material upon his feet. He carried a long spear in his right hand, and a shield upon his left arm, on which was written "Victory or Death." Firmly he sat in his saddle, gracefully he managed the powerful steel which was caparisoned like his rider in a full suit of mail. Riding once round the circle, he stopped before Annie, Countess of Saragossa, and bowed low before the queen of beauty. Then turning towards the centre, he espied a tall warrior of most perfect proportions, mounted upon a horse whose slender limbs, thin, arching neck, dilated nostrils, and quickly moving eye spoke of more speed than strength, but withal a power of endurance which might tire even the powerful charger so heavily loaded with mail. The latter knight carried no armor save a slender spear and spotless shield. He wore no coat of mail to protect his tender limbs from the assaults of his opponent, but a superb tunic of dark green velvet, bound about the waist by a heavy cord and tassels of the purest gold. From his helmet drooped to his shoulder a snowy plume. The saddle upon which he sat, was covered with crimson velvet, likewise adorned with a golden fringe and cumbersome tassels.

The horse and rider won the admiration of Onorata. Here no cumbersome mail marred the symmetry of their proportions, but free and light they stood in the full glare of the morning sun, ready to meet him of the shield entitled "Victory or Death."

The combatants exchanged salutations, then prepared for conflict. He of the Shield bore fiercely down upon him of the White Plume, who lightly evaded the onslaught. For a while he contented himself with merely defending and evading, then gathering all the powers of his well-formed, elastic muscles, in a moment when least suspected by the Shield, he couched his lance, and rapidly rushed upon his opponent. An attack so sudden, of such a nature, from such a mere stripling, was wholly unexpected. And thus he was unhorsed. The White Plume quickly springing upon the ground, removed his visor, thus disclosing the features of Ferdinand to the gaze of the admiring crowd, and extended his ungloved hand to his fallen foe. He of the Shield rose sullen and crest-fallen, covered with dust, presenting a sorry contrast to the White Plume, and took with gauntleted hand the proffered one of his youthful conqueror, in token that he acknowledged the defeat. If he had refused thus to do, Ferdinand would have been obliged to have decided the affair by a hand-to-hand contest, in which case the one apparelled the lightest would have been likely to have been the victor. Thus Ferdinand would have stood a more than fair chance of being still the victorious party, and the shield, "Victory or Death," would have been more appropriate "Victory or Defeat."

Ferdinand, according to the custom, desired to challenge and meet any of the knights who might accept the challenge, but a wound, which in the heat of the battle he had not noticed, now commenced to bleed profusely, obliging him much against his will, to retire thus early in the day, before he had won the wreath of which he dreamed. All day the Spanish youths contended for the smiles of beauty and renown. Onorata, after the first combat, having sketched what she deemed necessary, retired to watch beside her dear Ferdinand, who was inconsolable at his misfortune.

"Onorata, mio cara, how kind in you, thus to leave the gayeties of the tournament to watch beside my couch! I was very sad till you came. O Ona, you are very, very necessary to my happiness."

"Ferdinand, could I stay away from you, knowing how great a disappointment this confinement is to you? That ugly wound, how sorry I am! Ferdinand, I was a proud maiden when the Shield went down."

"Fie, Ona, darling! proud for thy lover! Ona, I must speak with my honored parents soon, that they may consent to our union."

"I have many misgivings, lately, Ferdinand. A dark cloud seems hovering round my head. I fear me thy noble parents will object to my plebeian birth."

"Foolish fears, my beautiful Ona. Have they ever treated you otherwise than with the utmost kindness and attention?"

"Nay, Ferdinand, but thy mother has ever kept before me the knowledge that a tacit understanding has long existed between the parents of the Countess Annie of Saragossa, and your father, that at some future time you should wed the fair Annie. I think it is the desire of your parents. And, dear Ferdinand, rather than displease my noble benefactors, I will give thee up, fly from this castle, under whose sheltering roof I have spent so many happy hours."

"Ona, darling, I do not like to hear you talk in that way. I know my parents tenderly love you, and that they cannot refuse the wish of my heart."

CHAPTER III.

"Hark to the tramp, and the drum,
And the mournful sound of the barbarous horn,
And the flap of the banners, that flit as they are borne,
And the neigh of the steed, and the multitude's hum.
And the clash, and the shout, 'They come! they come!'"

THE next day Ferdinand was so far recovered that he was able to be present and witness the contest. As on the day previous, the splendid pavilions were filled with a gay and expectant crowd. Annie of Saragossa sat upon her throne, lovely and pensive as before, only, as if more befitting the wilder sports of the day, she had exchanged her robe of blue and ermine for one of green velvet embroidered with gold and precious stones, a suit which contrasted finely with the crimson tapestry around her. So thought the artist maiden, as she sat in dangerous proximity to the slight partition separating her from the arena.

Again the trumpets sounded. Again the heralds cried aloud, "Make ready for the combat." A deep stillness pervaded the vast assembly. Every eye was strained to catch the first glimpse of the animal so strangely admired by all classes in Spain. "They come, they come!" With a snort of rage, a bull of the largest size, sleek and smooth, gaily ornamented with tiny flags, and beautiful flowers, came bounding into the broad arena, then standing in mute astonishment, he reared his head, and looked around, first at the people, who were now shouting their loud huzzas, then at the bright tapestry of the color his lordship did so abominate. Six lads, noted for their swiftness and agility, stood in places of comparative safety, waving their banners upon the staves, on which were fastened slender spurs with which to annoy his lordship still more, or in case he should prove too powerful for his adversary, to draw him away by turning his rage upon themselves. Amidst the blast of trumpets and the sound of martial music, Ivan, an artisan of manly proportions, mounted upon an iron gray charger of uncommon size, rode leisurely into the enclosure, and confronted the angry bull. This was a new object of interest for Jupiter, as the animal was familiarly called. A snort of derision sounded, he pawed the earth in fury, then lowering his head till the nostrils ploughed the ground, he bounded to meet Ivan, the lion-hearted. Calmly he sat in the saddle till just as all expected to see his horse tossed high in air on the horns of Jupiter, he lightly stepped aside, when the impetus carried the animal far beyond. Baffled, assailed on all sides by the pages, Jupiter was wild with rage. With rapid bounds, that made the earth to echo, he traversed the circumference of the circle.

The combat raged with redoubled fury. Ivan's horse was gored, and now he lay floundering in the sand in his death struggle. The courage of the lion-hearted was undaunted. Again and again did Jupiter assail and retreat. Alas, in his last, fair Onorata, heedless of the danger, leaning far out over the railing in her eagerness to note the dying struggles of the noble horse, caught the eye of the furious animal, who, seeing in the gentle maiden an object upon which to vent his rage, with a bound which cleared every obstacle, caught the light form of Ona upon his horns, ere Ivan could come to the rescue, and tossed her madly in the air.

"Ona, darling Ona!" shrieked Ferdinand, as heedless of his wounds, he leaped down beside the animal, and buried his sword deep in the heart of Jupiter, who sank with scarce a groan upon the ground. The wildest confusion reigned throughout the crowd. Ferdinand knelt beside the insensible maiden, took her in his arms, murmuring, "My life, my joy, come back to me, dear Ona, darling one!"

Friends crowded around. Lord De Castro chafed her hands with tender solicitude. Marquis Gabrino Fandolo, Lady De Castro, Countess Annie, all were there, sorrowing for the gifted maiden.

The scene was worthy the pencil of Angelo. In the centre of the arena, the iron gray charger, so recently full of life, lay quivering in the embrace of chilly death. Around the ground was wet with gore. Under the shadow of the throne where beauty had reigned supreme, the prostrate form of Jupiter, once so black and glossy, lay stiffened and cold, the tiny flags all soiled and torn, the flowers blood-stained, the fierce eye dimmed with the film of death. Near, so near that her garments rested in a pool of the animal's heart's blood, reclined Ona, her glorious head supported so tenderly by the champion of yesterday's tournament, who was pale with bodily suffering, and the fear that Ona was dead. Kneeling beside was Lord De Castro, robed in an elegant uniform, the star of nobility glittering upon his breast, holding the delicate hand of the artist maiden. Marquis Gabrino supported the slender form of Lady De Castro, as faint with terror she gazed upon her foster child. All around were pitying, anxious faces.

The marquis caused the heralds to make proclamation, that the festivities were suspended for the present, and soon the pavilions were left vacant, and all of that vast crowd dispersed, save the group around the suffering maiden, who now moaned faintly, as in severe pain. Gently they bore her to the castle, where for many weeks she lay upon a couch of suffering.

CHAPTER IV.

"My noble lady, I have much to say to you. Art disposed to listen, Ina?"

"It is ever my greatest pleasure to listen to mio cara sposa."

"Ina, hast thou never dwelt upon the end of this intimacy of our son, heir to my title and estate, with fair Ona, daughter of the peasant Vodisco?"

"Ay, that I have, and with deep pain. Ona is a beautiful maiden. I love her like a daughter. From the time I first took her infant form in these arms, I have felt for her a deep interest. I would not willingly pain her."

"Nay, sweet wife, I too love the gentle maiden. I would she were in reality sister to our Ferdinand; but well as I love her, I would not see our son wedded to her for this right hand. Annie of Saragossa is every way worthy of our noble son. In her, high blood, rare beauty, great wealth are happily combined. O, 'twill be a happy day when this perplexity is overcome!"

A slight rustling of the tapestry attracted their attention, and looking up they beheld Ona, pale as death, standing before them.

"My child, this is a surprise! Seat yourself in this easy chair." Saying which, Lord De Castro gently led the maiden to the luxurious seat in which he had been seated, and carefully arranged the pillows to support her head.

A faint smile parted the thin lips of Ona, as she thanked the kindhearted lord. As soon as she had become sufficiently calm, she said:

"Dearest and best of friends, I have been an unwilling listener to your conversation about Ferdinand and myself. I sorrow that I have been the cause of pain to you who have been to me more than parents. That I love your noble son I will not deny. O, yes, I tenderly love him. On my heart is painted in indelible colors, the image of my noble lover, for, Lord and Lady De Castro, he loves me even as I do him. We have not intended to deceive, but openly, you must confess, have shown our preference for each other. Living in such an atmosphere of love, I forgot the stern realities of life, forgot that I was not nobly born as he. I see it all, now—the wide gulf between us. Kind friends, I will never see him more. He shall marry Annie, Countess of Saragossa, and his escutcheon remain untarnished. I will go to Madrid, where my pencil will support me, and in the pursuit of fame, find, at least, contentment. How could you think, for a moment, I would prove ungrateful? I could not be that."

Lady De Castro was weeping, and Lord De Castro was coughing violently. Pride struggled with affection, and at last it gained a temporary victory. Annie was a countess, Ona was a plebeian. So the countess was preferred to the maiden, whose mind was a wonderful storehouse of good and noble thoughts.

"Ona, darling, you distress me much. Stay with us, and be our own dear daughter. Love Ferdinand as a brother, that's a dear child," at length spake the lady.

"Do you think, that having loved Ferdinand since I was a child, with all the fervor of my nature, I could narrow down the broad channel of that love to a little stream of sisterly affection? Do you think I could stand by and see my Ferdinand giving the love which is now all my own, to any other than myself? Annie of Saragossa is lovely, and if I go far from here, in time, Ferdinand may think more kindly of her. Seek not to detain me. There's madness in detention. I go hence ere the morrow's sun shall have set behind the mountains in the west."

Rising, Ona pressed her lips reverently upon the brow of Lord De Castro, then winding her emaciated arms about the neck of the weeping Lady Ina, they mingled their tears in unison together. Soon, however, overmastering her emotion, she arose, and bade her foster parents a faltering adieu.

"Ona, Ona!" called the lady; but she was gone, and heard not the call.

Retiring to her room, Ona packed what few articles she thought she could carry in her hand; taking what money she had about her, she secreted it in the folds of her dress, being fully resolved to leave the castle that night. She had in her possession a key which would unlock the eastern gate of the courtyard, leading into the park. So at still midnight, when slumber had thrown her chains around the household, Onorata, pale and weak from recent illness, stole quietly out of the home rendered dear to her by tender recollections, stepped noiselessly over the pavements of the court, only disturbing in her way a few decayed leaves and broken twigs whose cracklings fell like the sound of artillery upon her strained ears, so nervous had she become. She opened the gate, and passed out into the dim old park, whose giant trees cast gloomy shadows all around, presenting to her feverish imagination phantoms grim and tall, goblins old and weird, which stood in grinning silence ready to clasp her in their chilly arms. A shudder thrilled her through; her strength was exhausted, and with a scream that woke the echoes all around, she fell upon the ground, damp with the dews of night.

That cry was heard by the watchful porter, who, calling his dogs, lantern in hand, sallied forth in the direction from whence the sound came. A low growl from one of the dogs drew his attention to some object upon the ground. Opening his lantern, so that the full blaze of light might render it visible, he started back with alarm, as he recognized what he thought to be the corpse of Ona. Wonder and astonishment filled his mind. How came she here? What should he do with her? The latter question he could answer, but the first was still a mystery. So taking the maiden in his arms, he bore her into his lodge, and laid her upon his own rude couch. Like a pale water lily looked Ona, as white and motionless she lay stretched upon the couch. Her golden hair rested upon the pillow like a halo of glory around her head, and the long eyelashes drooped like a silken fringe upon her marble cheek.

The porter's next thought was to arouse the household. So ringing the alarm bell loudly, he waited with impatience an answer to his summons. A sleepy footman, rubbing his eyes, soon appeared, and desired to know the cause of the uproar.

"Call your master, lazy bones!" demanded the porter.

"Eh, what?" yawned Carlos.

"Call your master!" thundered the now enraged old man.

Soon there was hurrying to and fro in the castle. In those quiet times to be aroused at that unseasonable hour was something extraordinary. When Lord De Castro appeared at the porter's lodge, his looks plainly showed his inward anxiety, and hurriedly he demanded to know the cause of this disturbance.

"Indeed, my noble master, it is a strange affair. The young Signora Onorata—"

"Ona! what of her? tell me quickly."

"I fear, my lord, the beautiful signora is dead. I found —"

"Ona dead!" gasped Lord de Castro.

"Ona is not dead! Knave, it is false! Lead me to her," interposed Ferdinand, who had but just made his appearance.

"Would that it were false!" Saying which the aged porter led the way into his sleeping apartment, where they beheld the seemingly lifeless form of the artist girl.

"Blessed Virgin! how came she here?" ejaculated Lord de Castro.

Ferdinand gazed one moment upon the loved form, so beautiful in its cold rigidity, then laying his face close beside the white cheek of Ona, he murmured:

"Ona, precious Ona! my own sweet angel! my day-star! my only joy! come back to your unhappy Ferdinand! Or, if thou hast already joined thy sister angels, beseech the cruel messenger that took thee away to call thy Ferdinand, and he will gladly —"

"Ona is not dead!"

"Twas even so. Ona's eyes were opening slowly, as if the loved tones had power to recall the wandering spirit even from beyond the dark river of death.

CHAPTER V.

"Thus lived—thus died she: nevermore on her Shall sorrow light, or shame. She was not made Through years or moons the inner weight to bear,
Which colder hearts endure till they are laid
By age in earth."

ANNIE, Countess of Saragossa, was dying.—Within a spacious chamber, in her old ancestral home, many leagues away from Cordova, where so lately she had reigned in all the pride of her youthful beauty, queen of the tournament, Annie was dying. Earth was losing what heaven was gaining. Costly and elegant were the surroundings in that stilly room. Her couch rested gracefully upon the backs of silver swans, around whose slender necks the white satin draperies fell in heavy folds. Curtains of the same material, lined with a pale rose tint, were looped far back by heavy cords of silver, to admit the cool night-air. Wealth cannot purchase health, neither can it happiness. The debt of nature must be paid by all, lowly or nobly born. An aged duenna wiped the death damp from the fair brow of the dying countess, while tears filled her eyes as she thought how soon the grave would claim this flower so early blighted.

"Annie, dearest Annie, we are alone now as you have desired. I will listen to your words, darling."

"Marguerita, they say that I am dying—that ere the morning sunlight enters at the eastern window, my spirit shall have passed to the God who gave it. O, tell me, honest Marguerita, is it so?"

"Alas, my love, that it is so! I would not now deceive."

"O, 'tis hard to die, and I so young! I wonder if Ferdinand will mourn for me. O Marguerita! I love him." Tenderly, lingeringly she uttered that little word "him," yet the tone and word expressed a volume. She clasped the little crucifix more closely to her bosom, while her lips moved in prayer.

"Marguerita!"

"Here, love."

"Tell him that I prayed for him in dying—that Ona, though plebeian born, is worthy to be his bride. Give him my parting blessing."

Fainter grew the breathing, soft and low.—"Marguerita!" and the freed spirit, casting off that frail tenement of clay, soared to meet its God.

Annie, Countess of Saragossa, was an orphan of great wealth and respectability. The Marquis Gabrino Fandolo was her nearest relative, being the only brother of her departed mother. Ever of a delicate constitution, her unhappy love had probably hastened her end.

Though she could not awaken love in the heart of Ferdinand, who was of earth, earthy, the dark angel Azrael had conceived for her an all-absorbing passion. The maiden must be his, the bride of death, so he marked her for his own. One night he came and took sweet Aunie from her noble home, and in the ship Ereenia bore the gentle spirit to a fairer, nobler home in upper air.

A funeral at midnight! A procession of dark-robed men, bearing torches in their hands, followed the remains of the beautiful Countess of Saragossa to the gloomy tomb, wherein reposed so many of her ancestors. And the night-owl screeched, and the raven croaked, in unison with the hoarse chants of the priests, sounding dismally in the still night.

CHAPTER VI.

"My lord, this is indeed sad news. Dear Annie seemed ever frail, yet I looked not for her early death."

"Very sad, my lady. I recognize in this sad event the hand of an all-wise Providence. Annie's last words, as related to us by Marguerita, seem to me a gentle reproof for our pride. Ina, I now wish to see my son united to our fair Ona-rata."

"Dear husband, you have but spoken the language of my heart. Here comes Ona. Shall we speak with her? Ona, love, we are glad to see you thus improved. And now let me chide my child for her foolish runaway. Where did my sweet Ona think to go all alone, on foot, in the dark night?"

"Nay, dear lady, do not chide me—I hardly knew myself; I thought to go to Madrid."

"Ha! ha! to Madrid! What—across to the Sierra Morena mountains, the Guadalquivir, which is now so swollen by the freshet? And then again to climb the steep Toledos, which only the antelope may expect to surmount? and yet another river—the beautiful Tagus? Did my darling expect to overcome all these difficulties on foot and alone?"

"My lord, you are pleased to jest with me. I thought not to perform the weary journey by land merely. I could have sailed down the Guadalquivir; from thence by sea to the mouth of the Tagus on the shores of Portugal, whence it would be an easy journey to Madrid."

"Little visionary! but listen, Ona, we have a boon to crave of thee."

"A boon! Speak—it shall be granted."

"We crave this little hand for our son Ferdinand in marriage."

"Have you forgotten —"

"Nay, Ona; we have not. Our pride has at last been conquered, and we now humbly ask that our foster child will be our own dear daughter. But here comes Ferdinand. He can plead more eloquently than we."

I need only say that not many moons after there were great rejoicings in Cordova, for the only son of Lord and Lady de Castro was about to espouse Onorata Vodisco, the gifted artist-maiden. In process of time Ona completed the sketches commenced at the tournament, and they now ornament the picture-gallery of the palace, now a splendid ruin, years ago occupied by the Marquis Gabrino Fandolo. She painted many pictures—some of wonderful beauty. A picture of her infancy was one of her best. It was a labor of love, so that the coloring received a deeper glow, and the figures of Lord and Lady de Castro are true to life. And thus we leave the artist-maiden, triumphing in her art, a loved and honored wife.

THERE'LL DAWN A BRIGHTER DAY.

BY WILLIE WARE.

The clouds are dark and murky
That float above my head,
And from my heart the sunshine
And sweet content have fled.
The earth looks dark and dreary,
All, all is gloom profound;
The autumn winds are scattering
The withered leaves around,
And yet I'm not despairing,
I'll not give sorrow sway,
For the sun will drive away the clouds—
There'll dawn a brighter day.

'Tis vain to be repining
And wrapt in gloom alway,
For clouds will sometimes darken,
And cheerless make our way,
But then we know the sunshine
Will come to us again:
And it always seems the brighter
After falling rain.
Then let us still be hopeful,
To sorrow ne'er give way,
Remembering that, if cloudy,
There'll dawn a brighter day.

THE QUEEN'S OWN.

BY MARY A. NOWELL.

"God's death! but this is a lad who will do honor to his kindred some of these days! Look up, Robert Devereux! Thy poor father who, as some say, has found his death by no fair means. Perhaps so, but it is no tale for a child's ears. In faith, boy, thou hast thy mother's beauty. No fairer maiden ever graced our court than Lettice Knollys."

The boy looked up not bashfully, but boldly, and yet with a graceful reverence in his look, as if he had been accustomed all his life to the presence chamber. His bearing was just what would be most likely to please Queen Elizabeth. Besides, she had loved his grandmother who was her own cousin—Lettice Knollys, the daughter of Anne Boleyn's sister Mary, the wife of William Cary; and from her, she had transferred her love to Lettice Knollys, the daughter of her cousin. Robert Devereux was therefore the grand-nephew of the queen.

Lettice Knollys the younger had married Walter, Earl of Essex. This lady's beauty attracted the notice of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, while her husband still lived. There were dark hints of a slow poison being administered to Essex, by the agents of Leicester. The unfortunate man died in Ireland in 1576, and before his death, he wrote to supplicate Elizabeth to take care of his beloved children.

Soon after his death, Leicester repudiated his wife, Douglas, Lady Sheffield, and privately married the widow of Essex; a marriage afterwards repeated in presence of her father, Sir Francis Knollys. Under such circumstances, it was no wonder that the little earl should become a favorite with the queen. Leicester's marriages had before offended her deeply; this one most of all. Twice, too, had Lettice Knollys committed what, to Elizabeth's mind, was almost unpardonable, viz., wedding with the flower of her own court, once with the gallant Essex, and again with him who perhaps had more deeply impressed the queen's heart than any other living man.

If ever, then, the feelings akin to maternal love animated her soul, it was when Robert Devereux came before her, worse than orphaned. She adopted him into her affections, and was true to her charge over him, except that she lavished too much upon him, inciting him to extravagance and profusion that brought him into strong disrepute. Lord Burleigh was appointed his guardian. He placed him in Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was continually surrounded by those who knew his favor with the queen, and who scrupled not to take advantage of his really generous spirit. His debts were enormous, at one time amounting to twenty-three thousand pounds.

He returned to court at the time when all Elizabeth's heart was engaged with the gallant Raleigh. He was handsome and accomplished, and had quick occasion to prove his bravery also; and even Raleigh himself was thrown into the shade by this new aspirant for favor. When Philip of Spain laid claim to the throne of England as the heir of the line of Lancaster, and Elizabeth rallied all her forces to contest her right at the cannon's mouth, she bestowed the post of captain general of the cavalry upon Essex, then scarcely more than twenty-one years of age. English bravery vanquished Spanish boasting, and when the queen made up the jewels of her brave army, she did not forget the beloved Essex. She made him Knight of the Garter and bestowed on him strong personal marks of her royal favor.

In 1589, when Don Antonio, titular king of Portugal, sailed with a gallant fleet from Plymouth to Lisbon, to demand his right upon the throne of his ancestors, many brave young Englishmen volunteered to accompany him. Among them Robert Devereux enrolled himself. Breaking away from the flower-wrought chains of courtly ease, he devoted himself to the high-strung chivalry of the times, and saw no bar to winning the prize for the youthful Antonio.

Elizabeth was thunderstruck at his secret departure, and made haste to recall him, but too late. He had joined the fleet already, and it was far out at sea. The first man to the attack—the one too, to challenge the governor at the gates of Lisbon to single combat—was Robert Devereux. One would almost think him bound by the ties of blood to Henry VIII., instead of to his gentle and unfortunate queen.

He expected reproaches and perhaps punishment from Elizabeth, for thus deserting his office about her person, to take up service for a foreigner—but she was too happy to see him return unharmed by the pestilence which had decimated the army, taking away six thousand of the brave volunteers in this unsuccessful enterprise. In a moment of fondness, while loading him with caresses, she gave him a ring, pledging herself that, if he ever forfeited her favor, the sight of this ring sent back to her, should win pardon for his offence.

This ring was a sardonyx, with a cameo head of Elizabeth. The circlet was gold with engraved sides—the inside of blue enamel; the execution of the head was of a very high order, and the whole was a superb affair, doubtless, got up for the express purpose of presenting it to Essex. The jewel has descended in unbroken succession from the daughter of Essex, Lady Frances Devereux, for almost three centuries, until it has fallen into the possession of the present heir—Rev. Lord John Thynne—a proof of its material and its superior workmanship, as it has indisputably been worn by each successive possessor.

After this time, Elizabeth began to show that strange anomaly of her character, the strong desire of being beloved by those to whom, had she contracted matrimonial ties, she might have been grandmother. Essex had lost his character of protege, and was elevated into that of lover of the royal girl, who now began to look with eyes of ill-concealed jealousy upon the young and beautiful ladies of her court; among whom the Lady Mary Howard was the fairest and loveliest.

This damsel, full of the gaiety of youth and a certain graceful sauciness in her deportment, somewhat as might be expected in one in whose veins flowed the blood of all the Howards, frequently omitted her small duties to the queen. Elizabeth was not slow to remark every delinquency. She had once prohibited Lady Mary from wearing a costly velvet kirtle, and perhaps the affront was treasured deeply in the young beauty's heart; for, as recorded by William Fenton, she had "refused to bear her mantle at the hour her majesty is wonted to air in the garden, and on small rebuke, did vent such unseemly answer as did breed great choler in her mistress," so that "she swore she would no more show her any countenance, but out with such ungracious, flouting wenchings."

But at the bottom of all the anger for the young lady's short-comings, there lay the bitter root of that jealousy which was engrafted deep in the nature of Elizabeth, and which the young and fair were perpetually in danger of disturbing. So cruelly did she often reproach her ladies for slight faults, that Elizabeth Fenton told her brother they would often cry aloud at her stinging words.

If Lady Mary Howard had indeed lain her young heart unasked, at the feet of Robert Devereux, it availed her nothing. His own heart worshipped at another shrine. The young and lovely daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham—the widow of the gallant Philip Sidney—loved and was beloved most truly by Essex. While the queen herself was harboring intentions towards him of a nature but little equivocal, and which did not stop short of elevation to the highest honors, Essex had already put it out of her power to fulfil them. Loyal to her, as his queen—respectful, nay, almost affectionate to her as a relation, and remembering her exceeding kindness to his boyhood, still nothing was further from his mind than the alliance she meditated. His whole soul would have revolted from it, nor could he have suffered himself to be bought, as the two French princes, Anjou and Alencon had submitted to be, by the title of king-consort. Afterwards, it is true, when the snares of the world had rubbed off the delicate bloom of generous youth, he was not so scrupulous; but now every thought was merged in the fair woman who, by giving him her hand, brought no dishonor upon the memory of her brave husband.

When the queen heard of the marriage, her rage exceeded all bounds. She refused Essex the command of the troops which she sent to Henry of Navarre, although, according to Eger-ton, he remained kneeling before her for hours, pleading to receive it. It was not until Henry himself desired her to send him with the additional force which she raised for his service, that she consented. In a letter to Henry, she begs him to see that the youth commits no rashness to peril his life—showing that she still regarded him with affection.

When Walter Devereux was killed in battle, she sent for his brother to return; but afterwards yielded to his strong petitions to remain and sustain his reputation for bravery. When he returned, he had lost that beautiful resemblance to the dead husband of Lady Essex which had won her affection; and his heart was divided between her and court honors which only a semblance of devotion to the queen could obtain for him. And Elizabeth, grateful for not being annoyed by the praises of the neglected wife from her husband's lips, gave herself to the pleasing delusion that, notwithstanding her threescore years, she had made an impression on the young and handsome object of her affection. Like Leicester, who had been the fountain head for all favor and preferment, in his day of rule, Essex was continually besieged by place-seekers. As far as Elizabeth could give up to any one in court matters, she deferred to Essex.

Perhaps her love for him was never more conspicuous than when, after repeated attempts on the part of Essex to re-establish his mother in her good graces, she at length consented to a meeting after twenty years separation. This was nine years after the death of Leicester, and when Elizabeth might well have forgiven the transgression of the youthful Lettice for marrying him—for it was on this point and not on that of forsaking her husband, that the queen had showed enmity toward her. There was tenderness in her manner when they did meet; but Elizabeth's old obstinacy came up before it ended, and she denied her request to come again.

Meantime, through the reckless love of mischief which the sister of Essex, Lady Rich, delighted in, the favorite found his disgrace certain. She and her husband had opened a correspondence with the King of Scots, in which court gossip was conspicuous. In this correspondence, unintentional wrong was done to the frail lady's brother; for, under false names, it was represented that Essex was tired of his present situation, and longed for the queen's death. Burleigh had a spy in Scotland, who communicated various reports to him, and he was only too glad to carry them to Elizabeth.

A tempestuous scene, in which the favorite presumed too much upon his power, fully disgraced him. Contempt for the queen earned him the memorable box on the ear, and his own action of grasping his sword hilt, and his rash speech which ended in "a king in petticoats" completed his ruin. Some faint show of forgiveness was extended afterwards, but it died away. The queen's temper was completely soured; and its violence, instead of wearing out with her years, increased. Not even the clergy were exempted from her stern rebukes or sarcastic retorts. Whitehead, Godwin, Vaughan, all came under the ban of her displeasure. Alexander Nowel, Dean of St. Paul's, preached before her in public, and happening to introduce a sentence not agreeable to her, she called out to him "Leave that ungodly digression and return to your text."

She was now sixty-six years old; just double the age of Essex; still wearing her neck uncovered, and dressing in white silk, with a profusion of jewels. It is to be doubted whether personal vanity or the love of power were her greatest passion.

The star of Essex had set. He was a prisoner, not being allowed to write to his wife, who had just given birth to an infant, and who was sorrowing that she could not see or hear from its father, although her mother, Lady Walsingham, besought the queen to permit a correspondence. Not even his own physician was allowed access to him when suffering from sickness. Lady Essex endeavored to propitiate her with jewels, but even these did not move her. In a moment of despair, the unhappy countess appeared at court, dressed in black, and implored Lady Huntington to prevail upon Elizabeth to allow her to visit her husband in his illness. She was contemptuously refused. When the tardy permission at length came, the affectionate wife found him but the shadow of the handsome and lordly Robert Devereux.

At length the sentence is gone forth from the hand that he might once have called his own. No weak, trembling, woman's handwriting is the fatal signature to the death warrant, but firm and steady, as if it were a love-letter to the man she had loved so well, or that famous letter which she once wrote to Henry of Navarre, bespeaking his care of the rash youth, Essex.

It may be that Elizabeth trusted to the return of the ring which she had given him in the first years of her attachment; that ring, bearing her own royal countenance, and which was to ensure his pardon, offend as he might. Essex trusted, too; but he did not dare send it by any of the persons about him. Early one morning, a boy craved admittance to the apartment of the Countess of Nottingham with a message from Essex, accompanying the ring, to be delivered to the queen. They were intended for her sister, Lady Scroope, who was friendly to Essex; but the innocent child had mistaken her sister of Nottingham for herself.

The countess carried the ring to her husband, the lord-admiral, and they decided that neither ring nor message should ever reach Elizabeth. If the queen waited for this mute pledge, she waited, alas! in vain. No kindly hand brought the cherished jewel to remind her of forgiveness; and the offender's days were numbered. He who had overthrown the first man at the battle of Zutphen, crying "For the honor of England, my fellows, follow me!" warring bravely by the side of Philip Sidney—who did her good service in that conflict with the Spanish Armada, when

"Swift to east and swift to west,
The warning radiance spread High on St. Michael's Mount it shone—
It shone on Beachy Head;"

who was the foremost to leave the boats, wading to the shoulders, to reach the castle of Peniche, and the first to beat against the gates of Lisbon—who detected the plot of the Jew, Lopez, against the queen's life, and who challenged the governor of Rouen "to meet him on horse or foot, and by personal encounter, to decide which was the better man, fought in the better cause, or served the fairest mistress."

Yet all these things were forgotten or put beneath her royal will; and when the news of his execution was brought into the privy chamber, she continued playing upon the instrument with which she had all the morning amused herself!

But her people never forgave her the death of their idol, and her last days were full of regrets that came too late. The death of the Countess of Nottingham, who confessed on her dying bed, her deception concerning the ring, was only the precursor of her own. What emotions this confession called up, may be imagined; for she struck the expiring woman as she lay, shrieking out "God may forgive you, but I never can."

OLD MAIDS.

Many of the satirical aspersions cast upon old maids tell more to their credit than is generally imagined. Is a woman remarkably neat in her person, "she will certainly die an old maid." Is she frugal in her expenses and exact in her domestic concerns, "she is cut out for an old maid." And if she is kind and humane to the animals about her, nothing can save her from the appellation of "old maid." In short, we have always found that neatness, modesty, economy and humanity are the never-failing characteristics of an "old maid."—Family Mirror.

OATHS IN BRAZILIAN COURTS.

In the matter of swearing oaths, not only America but England might take a lesson from Brazil. Instead of a sleepy clerk, usher, or registrar mumbling over an oath, in a tone and terms irresistibly ludicrous, were they only audible, all the court—judge, officers and bar—and all the spectators rise and stand while the oath is solemnly administered, the witness swearing audibly with his hand on the Bible. All stand, also, when the jury leave or enter the court-room.—Brazil and the Brazilians.

ROBERT AND RUTH.—Their Loves.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

"RUTH—Ruthy Bell! why don't you come in here? I declare, I believe the child's deaf! Robert, go out and find the girl and bring her in to supper. Jest as likely's not, she's down by the pond looking arter lilies, or something jest as foolish." And the speaker, Mrs. Martin, came in from the door where she had been to call the girl, and rolling down her sleeves, took her seat at the supper-table, while Robert her son, a lad of about twelve, went in quest of his cousin Ruth.

"Well, mother, I expected Ruthy would trouble you some. She's a queer sort of a child—jest like her mother at her age." And Mr. Martin brushed away a tear at the remembrance of his sweet youngest sister, "the flower of the family," as she was always called. "Her mother was allers down by the pond gathering lilies at this season, and she'd come up to the house with a wreath round her party hair, looking like a rale picter;—and there, see, mother, there comes Ruthy, looking for all the world as her mother used to fifteen years ago!"

Mrs. Martin glanced up to her niece Ruth Bell, coming up the lane hand in hand with her son Robert, a happy expression on her face, and beautiful white water lilies twisted amid her dark locks. It soothed the irritated housewife, and she said, mildly, to her husband:

"Well, Nathan, I s'pose I am apt to speak sharp sometimes. I love the girl; she is to me almost as near as our own child Robert, for she is a pretty creature, with such winsome ways that a body couldn't help taking her to their heart, and she and Robert are a deal of company for each other. He never goes off by himself with his books in the woods, as he used to, to be gone all day, for Ruthy goes with him now, and they always come back together when she gets tired."

"It'll do the boy good," said the farmer, "for he liked to be alone too much for his own good, before Ruthy came here."

Just then Ruth and Robert came in. The girl's hair was decked with white lilies, which she had gathered at the pond, and she carried a large bunch in her hand. Her dark eyes were sparkling with mirth, as she exclaimed, quite out of breath:

"Look, aunt and uncle! do look at Robert! Doesn't he look comical?" And she laughingly drew him forward, crowned with a large wreath of lilies, the long stems trailing down over his face."

"Come, children, to your suppers. It's time, Robert, for you to drive the cows up from the pastur, and Ruthy can go with you," said Mr. Martin, as he gazed smilingly on their happy faces. And after they had partaken of their supper, Robert and Ruth went gleefully out to drive up the lowing kine, to be milked by the busy housewife, Mrs. Martin.

Mr. Martin was a well-to-do farmer, and a more honest, upright man was not to be found in that section of the country where he lived. His wife, good woman, was a pattern of a thrifty, industrious housewife; and none around could vie with her in a carefully kept house or dairy. Her manner was a little sharp sometimes, but a kinder heart never beat than that in her breast. Their only child Robert, a lad of about twelve, with a dreamy look in his fine, dark eyes, possessed a taste for knowledge, which had caused his parents considerable anxiety, for it was their wish that he should remain at home and be a farmer; but the boy's thirst for knowledge was not to be quenched—in the district school he had outstripped both pupils and teacher, and now he was under the instruction of the minister at the village.

Over a year had elapsed, since by the death of Mr. Martin's youngest, widowed sister, little Ruthy Bell had come to dwell with them, to be a companion for Robert, and help make music in the old farmhouse. And their hearts had twined around the girl with almost the affection they felt for their own son. She was "a sweet, winsome child," as Mrs. Martin had said—with large, dark brown eyes, which only gave sunny looks and smiles, and hair of a chestnut hue, long, silken and wavy. What wonder then, that the farmer and his wife looked upon her almost as a child of their own—and Robert, too, gazed on her but to liken her to everything bright and beautiful.

And thus passed four years in childhood's joys and sorrows to the two children—in summer time rambling in the forest, playing by some frolicking brook, Robert culling the earliest flowers with which to deck Ruthy's hair, searching among the last year's dead leaves for the long, trailing pink and white arbutus, or gathering the early violet, and in the bright June days seeking lush-red strawberries among the meadow grass.

Then came a change. Robert went from home to attend college—and Ruth, too, went from the old farmhouse to a seminary some distance from home, and the farmer and wife were left alone for a time. Four years passed, and Robert who had remained in school that period, save a visit home at the annual vacations, now came home at his graduation, to spend the summer, preparatory to commencing the study of law in a distant city. Ruthy was already at the farmhouse before him. They had both altered much in that time. Robert had attained a manly stature, and had a deeper look in his dreamy eyes, and a firmer carriage of his erect head; and Ruthy had grown a tall, graceful young lady, with the slight, girlish form just budding into womanhood. Her eyes had a graver look, and her hair a deeper shade.

That was a pleasant season to those two young beings—those long summer days spent in wandering in the dim old woods, to the music of the old brook waters; and it was there that the love which was born when they first wandered there as children, ripened beneath the soft blue skies. A knowledge of this soon came to their hearts, and one bright September eve preceding his departure from home, Robert told that love to Ruth, and she listened with bowed head and mantling blush—then, looking up with a new light in her brown eyes, put her hand in his. He needed no other answer. And that night, as they stood before the farmer and his wife and received their blessing, they were both happy.

The next morning Robert bade adieu to his parents and Ruthy for the scene of his legal studies, with high hopes and bright anticipations for the future; and Ruthy, standing in the doorway in the early dawn, with a new happiness in her heart and shining out through her beautiful eyes, bade her lover a tender farewell.

"You will write me, Ruth, often—all your heart—will you not?" said Robert, at leaving. And Ruth made answer that she would.

Thus passed three years—Robert going home only once in that time for a short visit, but feeling repaid for the months of hard, close study, in reading the long, tender letters which came weekly from Ruth.

"In the pleasant June," thus wrote Robert in closing his last letter to Ruth, "I shall come home for a short vacation, and with me a fellow-student, Philip Cheever, who is a Southerner from New Orleans. He has always had a strong desire to see life in a New England farmhouse, and thinks the pure country air will restore his health."

It was at the close of a balmy day in June, that Robert Martin arrived at the old farmhouse, and with him his friend Philip Cheever, who was heartily welcomed by the farmer and his wife. But as Robert presented him to his cousin Ruth, and noticed the look of undisguised admiration with which he regarded her, a cloud came to his heart, which was yet to deepen and enshroud his whole being. As Ruth left the room, Philip exclaimed to him :

"Why, Robert Martin, man! how can you stay in the city poring over old musty law books, while your home possesses such attractions? I declare, I believe you are destitute of le grande passion which we Southerners possess in such a degree; for even the beautiful Julia Belmont, the belle of the city, found no favor in your eyes, though all knew that she tried every means to attract you to her—and now—"

A deep flush came to the broad brow of Robert, as he interrupted his friend, saying :

"Stop, my friend, you are mistaken! My cousin Ruth and myself are betrothed, and now you know why I was insensible to the favor of the fair Julia."

"Come, Robert," said Mr. Martin, just then entering. "Your friend must feel like taking some supper, after your long ride; and I hope that our good country air will bring the color to his pale cheeks again, and give him a good appetite."

They followed the farmer to the kitchen, where all the delicacies of the country were set before them. And Philip Cheever, by his sprightly conversation and graceful manner, soon completely won the hearts of Robert's father and mother. Later in the evening, while his friend conversed with the farmer and his wife, telling them of his Southern home—describing graphically life on a plantation, and the careless, happy negroes, Robert and Ruth were seated by the open window conversing in low tones, and Robert felt then, as he gazed on Ruth, that it would be wrong to doubt her love—that none could ever come between them—and he banished the suspicion which had crept into his heart, for was not his friend engaged to a beautiful Southern lady? Had he not seen her miniature in a costly setting? And now he would not wrong him by a suspicion.

The days passed quickly at the farmhouse—days of happiness to all. Good Mrs. Martin felt honored by her son's guest, and she placed at his disposal every luxury of the farmhouse. Farmer Martin liked nothing so well as to have youthful faces about him, and he took pride in his handsome son Robert; while Ruth and Robert were happy in each other's society, and Philip Cheever made himself at home from the first. But none knew that beneath that fair exterior, beat a heart devoid of principle—that Philip Cheever, handsome, graceful and fascinating, was also proud, passionate and unrelenting, when once his eyes were fixed upon aught he would possess. Ruth Bell was a sweet wild flower, an early spring violet, and gazing upon her, his eyes burned with fiery glances, as the hot noon-day sun beats down on the unprotected flower. Ah, Robert Martin, better for thy peace and happiness, that thy friend had never crossed the threshold of thy home!

A month went by, and Robert and his friend were to return to the city on the morrow, when Philip said, at supper-time :

"Well, Mr. Martin, I like your place so well, that I shall beg leave to remain a few weeks longer. I do not feel as though I could study if I returned, for I should be thinking of the green fields and sparkling streams about here; and besides, I feel that I am not yet recovered from my illness, and the hot, stifling air of the city would not strengthen me overmuch. What say you, Robert?" turning to him. "Perhaps you could prevail on your good mother to keep me a little longer, and I'll promise not to be very troublesome to her."

"O stay, by all means! My parents will be very glad, and I have no doubt that the country air will do you good," said Robert.

And thus Robert Martin went forth from his home, from his cousin Ruth, and knew not that he had left a viper behind, in the home nest, that which would sting him to the heart's core.

The long summer days passed, and still Philip Cheever prolonged his stay. And was it to be wondered at, that the serpent charmed and fascinated Ruth Bell? That the wary Southerner taught her a new lesson, while telling her of his beautiful Louisianian home and of the luxuriance and beauty of all there? Was it to be wondered at, that, as together they trod the dim old woods in those soft summer days, and rested on the greensward—as he plucked for her the lilies she loved so well, and bound them on her brow, gazing on her the while with his ardent eyes, that her heart forgot her cousin Robert—that the pure love she had bestowed on him seemed tame in comparison to that she now experienced, and that she listened when Philip Cheever poured an impassioned tale into her ear hinting of her cousin's preference for the beautiful Julia Belmont, and that all that stood between their happiness was his early engagement with her, which he was too honorable to break? And so Ruth listened, and did not repulse him; and that night, as she sought her chamber, pacing back and forth with crimsoned face and flashing eyes, she exclaimed :

"Yes, yes, I will go with Philip Cheever! It is not wrong! Robert has ceased to love me, and would wed another but for our engagement. He shall be free; and I—ah, yes, I shall be happy! Philip's love will not grow cold. We shall be married and go to sunny Italy. O, I shall be happy!" And she paused before the open window, looking out upon the night.

When the morning light came, Ruth was far away. The sun shone in at the window of a deserted chamber, and Farmer Martin and his wife sought in vain for their lost child. And Philip Cheever, where was he? He, too, had vanished. But a letter which Mrs. Martin found lying on Ruth's table told all:

"DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER—for such you have always been to me—I am about to leave my kind home for another. You will think it wrong, but know that I shall leave it honorably, as the wife of Philip Cheever, whom I love devotedly. Robert will forget me soon in the love of another. He has forgotten me already. I cannot write much, as I have little time. I go. Dear father and mother, God guard and keep you, as I pray he will. Your child, RUTH."

The farmer and wife read the note with weeping eyes and sorrow-stricken faces; then they immediately wrote to Robert, whom the next week brought to the farmhouse. But after reading Ruth's letter, he besought his parents to do or say nothing more, as it was her own choice; and stifling his great sorrow in his heart, he went back to his studies a changed man. "Philip Cheever has won her from me with a lie," he said, "but if she loves him, and he makes her happy, I am content."

Again three years went by—years of application to his profession to the young lawyer—and bringing no change to the old farmhouse. It was at the close of a sultry afternoon in August, and Farmer Martin was returning from the field, where he had been at his day's labor. With hot, flushed brow and weary step, he came toward the farmhouse, stopping by the pond a moment to rest and cool him.

"Why, bless me! what's that?" he ejaculated, as his eye caught sight of some white object lying on the opposite bank. "Why, it looks like a human being, a woman asleep! Maybe somebody's been in the woods after berries, and stopped to rest by the pond, and so fell asleep! But," he continued, "whoever it is, she hadn't oughter stay there long, and I'll jest step round and speak to her." He went around some little distance to the opposite side of the pond, but as he advanced near the prostrate form, and saw the white lilies twined amid the dark, dishevelled tresses, and bending down, caught a sight of the white face, he started tremblingly back, exclaiming:

"Yes, yes, 'tis she, my poor Ruthy! My poor broken lily—come back to die among the flowers she loved so well!" He raised her tenderly in his strong arms, as though she were but an infant in weight, and carried her to the house. As he was met in the doorway by his wife, with an alarmed look on her face, he cried:

"She has come back, mother—our poor Ruthy has come back to us! I've always said she'd come back to the old place again!" And he carried her to the room which was hers in childhood, laying her tenderly on the bed.

"She is dead, Nathan! See how pale she is!" exclaimed Mrs. Martin, bending over the still form. "O, Nathan, she came back to die at the very door, and we did not know it to soothe her last moments!"

"No, no, mother, she is not dead—she lives, her heart beats!" said her husband, taking the cold hand in his, feeling the pulse, and bending down his head to catch the feeble beat of the almost stilled heart. "She will revive—she must come to—our poor child! She will come to by rubbing and hot drink!" And the farmer and his wife saw, after half an hour's time, a faint color came to the pale cheeks, and a quickened beat of the heart.

But Ruth revived only to wander off in a wild, incoherent way. Rising in bed, and looking around the room, her eyes resting on her uncle and aunt, she muttered: "All, all a dream!—yes, yes, a dream! But Robert, where is he? We played together by the brook, he gathered these lilies for me!" her eyes resting on the crushed flowers in her hair. "Yes, he was very kind. We wandered together through the green woods, and rested by the cool waters—and he loved me—he told me so, there; and I loved him so well, too! Yes," she cried, "you needn't laugh and say 'twas false, standing there!" shaking her head at the farmer and his wife. "You know we were to be married, and that we loved each other! Robert—Robert, why don't you come to the wedding? See, I am all ready, the flowers are in my hair—the minister will come! Robert, where are you? Ah, I know," she continued, her voice taking a plaintive tone, "yes, you are in the city. There is a lady there, a beautiful lady, but I know who she is—Julia Belmont is her name. He told me—Philip Cheever told me that my Robert loved her—that he was proud and ambitious, and had got wearied of me. O, Philip Cheever!" she shrieked, starting up, "it wasn't true! Robert loved me all the time—you knew it, and you lied to me! O, Philip, you wooed me then in the old woods, and I fled with you. But, Philip, we were married!" she went on. "Don't say it again, that it was not so—it will kill me! There was a minister," she continued, in a softer tone; "I remember his name was like mine—you said so then! that it was like mine—and his wife, she saw us married, too! You can't say 'twas false, Philip! O, Philip, you won't be so cruel! You can't be married again—'twill be wrong! Let me go!" she shrieked, as she struggled to get free from the farmer, who held her in bed. "I must tell her before it is too late! He will go and deceive her. He is my husband!" she exclaimed fiercely, turning her eyes on them. "Let me go—he mustn't marry her! But O, he has gone to a second wedding in his own sunny home he used to tell me about. Ha, ha!" And she laughed a wild, insane laugh, which thrilled through the hearts of those two by the bedside. "It'll be a gay wedding, for I wear the ring;" and she thrust out her hand. "This proud lady, Gertrude Harlow, can't have it!" And she hastily hid her hand under the bedclothes.

At length, completely exhausted, she sank into a broken slumber, and Mrs. Martin, who watched by her through the long night, said to her husband:

"She will be better when she wakes. But some wrong has been done, Nathan. She raves about facts. I believe you'd better write for Robert to come home, and he will get at the bottom of it."

Next day a letter was despatched for Robert to return. He was sitting in his office when the letter was brought, in the well-known handwriting of his father. He broke the seal, and as he read he grew fearfully pale, pressing his hand upon his heart, as if to check its rapid beating. A few minutes he sat thus, then springing from his chair, told his clerk he was going home for a few days, and went out; and making a few hasty arrangements, jumped aboard the train which swiftly bore him to his home.

He came, a sad, grave-looking man. In the three years that had elapsed since Ruth's disappearance, and Robert's great sorrow had come to him, he had become famed in his profession. Men far and near sought counsel of him in intricate cases, and his words were those of wisdom. He had changed much from the dreamy-eyed boy who used to dwell in the old farmhouse.

Six months had passed since the day Robert Martin received the letter calling him home, and in that time, Ruth had recovered from her illness, and yet remained at the old farmhouse with her uncle and aunt. Robert had stayed at home for a few days only, and then gone out to seek for proofs of the marriage of his cousin Ruth with Philip Cheever.

In a Southern city, a brilliant party was assembled to witness the marriage of the beautiful heiress Gertrude Harlow, with Philip Cheever, who had just returned from Europe, where he had been travelling for the last three years. It was known that they had been long engaged, even before he went abroad—that on account of his health he had prolonged his stay; and now, on his return, the marriage was to be consummated. The guests were all assembled in the elegant drawing-rooms, brilliantly lighted with perfumed lamps. Noble, whole-souled Southern gentlemen—ladies, beautiful in tropic bloom, and clad in costly laces and flashing gems—but fairest of them all was Gertrude Harlow, as she entered with a train of bridesmaids, to trust her future life in the care of Philip Cheever. And he, as he advances to meet her as she enters—we see that three years have told lightly with him. There is the same look in the dark, fascinating eyes, the same ensnaring smile, a little more fullness of the figure, and a slightly foreign air, lending an additional dignity to him. And as they stood there, those two about to be united, a murmur of approbation ran around the room. All eyes were intent on the handsome pair; and none noticed the opening of the door, and the entrance of a tall figure, a stranger among them.

But, as the ceremony proceeded, and the minister looking around on those present, came to the words, "If any one can show just cause why these two shall not be joined in the holy bonds of wedlock, I pray him speak now, or ever after hold his peace!" As these words sounded forth, there came a response:

"Hold," cried a calm, deep voice, which startled all present, causing them to hold their breath, "I can show why the wedding should proceed no further!"

"You!—who are you?" exclaimed Philip Cheever, starting forward with haughty look and tone, supporting the half-fainting form of his (almost) bride on one arm, and instinctively placing his hand where he usually carried his pistols. "Who dares intrude here?" But when he had taken a second look at the face of the stranger, a livid pallor crept over his features, and his limbs shook beneath him.

"You recognize me, then, Philip Cheever? Three years have not made so great a change in me as you could wish, perhaps!" said that calm, thrilling voice. "You, too, are looking the same as when we visited my home three years ago—you, to creep like a serpent, as you were, not only into my home, but into the heart of my betrothed filling her mind with base fabrications concerning me! You did your work well, Philip Cheever! Your tongue was smooth and oily, and under cover of illness, you remained when I went forth again, and then won my affianced. But, Philip Cheever, she was yours honorably—Ruth Bell was your wife—yet now you would seek to cast her off, putting her aside with a lie! But I have the proofs of that wedding, and therefore you stand here a perjured man!"

"This marriage cannot take place!" he said, turning again to the amazed minister. "If any further information is needed concerning the matter, it can be obtained by writing to Robert Martin, lawyer, at B——." And bowing low to the astonished company, he went out.

And while all eyes were fastened on the speaker, none had noticed that Philip Cheever also left the room. And in the confusion that followed, and the increasing darkness of the night, he made his escape from the Crescent City, leaving behind a stricken heart—that of Gertrude Harlow.

Two years more passed, and it was Christmas time. Within and about the farmhouse there was little change. Farmer Martin had grown somewhat stouter, but there were the same pleasant smile on the ruddy face, and the same merry glance of the twinkling blue eyes. The black, shining hair of Mrs. Martin was streaked with silver, and the forehead traced by the lapse of time. With Ruth the change was greater than when we saw her last; there were the same dark, dreamy eyes, with a saddened look in their depths, the same beautiful hair of her girlhood, and health was in her rounded form.

There were great preparations going on this Christmas, for Robert was expected home. It was his first visit for two years; as he had been called to Europe on an important case, and had but just returned, after winning both the case and fame in his absence; and no wonder that Mrs. Martin and Ruth had been more than ordinarily anxious for the expected one, who had not been with them for these two long years.

"Well, mother, here comes the stage—and here is Robert!" exclaimed Mr. Martin, as just then, the stage made its appearance down the turnpike.

A tall, handsome man was soon in the arms of his parents; then, turning to Ruth, he greeted her as in the days of their childhood. Robert Martin did not look so grave, as when he last set foot in the farmhouse. That was a happy Christmas time—the happiest which many a year had brought—and one which also brought back the joy of the past, and bade it sit down with them at the festal board.

"Have you heard anything from Philip Cheever?" asked Robert of his father, the next day in conversation.

"Yes, yes; we saw his death in a Californy paper, over a year ago; and after that, a letter came to Ruthy from him, sent from Californy by the doctor who attended him in his last sickness. It was an affecting letter, Robert. He asked her forgiveness for the wrong he had done her, saying that he was dying of consumption, in a strange land, with no friend but the kind doctor who attended him—and begging her forgiveness for the past, adding that he could not die in peace unless she granted it. But she did not get the letter until after his death—poor fellow! The girl felt bad enough about it. He left her all his property at the South, 'to make amends for his unkindness,' he said. So our Ruthy's a rich woman now—though I know that won't change your feelings a mite, Robert."

The tender look which came to Robert's eyes, and lighted them with the same dreamy expression of his youth, was enough answer without the words which followed:

"And Ruth is free now? Cheever—poor fellow!—God knows I did not wish his death—but Ruth will be happier now, I believe."

In the springtime Robert came again to the farmhouse, and when he returned to his city home, he carried with him Ruth Cheever as his bride. They returned to the plighted faith of their youth, and the past was to them but a dimly remembered dream.

MR. SPURGEON AND THE NOBILITY.

At Abercarn, the other day, Mr. Spurgeon preached in a field to at least 20,000 people. Among those present were the Lord-Lieutenant of Monmouthshire and Mrs. H. Leigh; Lord Tredegar, Lady Tredegar, and the family; Lord Llanover, Lady Llanover, and the family; and a large number of the leading gentry of the country. Previous to commencing worship, it was represented to the preacher that it would be advisable for the large concourse of people to move aside, to enable the several carriages and four to approach near the platform; upon which he replied that he did not come there to preach to horses, but to men; four horses and carriages would occupy the ground of fifty people, and therefore the horses and carriages must remain where they were. After the service, the lord-lieutenant sent for Mr. Spurgeon and invited him to visit Pontypool; but Mr. Spurgeon replied that he was sorry he could not comply with his lordship's wish, as he had full engagements for the next two years.—Cardiff Guardian.

MY EARLY HOME.

BY A. W. BELLAW.

Long cherished roof of tender years,
Sweet stage of childhood's scene,
I hail thee with a pilgrim's tears,
Though years have passed between.

Ah, weary years they've been to me,
But I regret their loss;
And ruthless years they've been to thee,
Dim hid in velling moss.

I see Time peep from every rent,
I see it on the door;
The very air is indolent,
That was so spry before.

How oft beneath this solemn porch
Have I with pleasure played,
When Life held boldly out his torch,
When sunshine knew no shade.

The grass is green upon the lawn,
But falling are the trees;
O, see, ye spirits of the gone,
Your lives decayed like these!

Dear Memory, feast your royal eye,
For bounded is my stay;
My heart's deep fountain has grown dry,
And I must haste away.

Long cherished roof of tender years—
My early home, farewell!
I give to thee my pilgrim tears—
It was for thee they fall.

REVENGE AT LAST.

BY EDWARD FERHAM.

For time at last sets all things even;
And if we do but mark the hour,
There never yet was human power
Which could evade, if unforgiven,
The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a wrong.

BYRON'S MAREPPA.

WHETHER it is right in all cases to forgive an unprovoked wrong done to us, we will leave for moral philosophers to debate; together with the question, whether repentance or atonement should be the conditions of pardon, and with that other important question, whether a readiness to excuse a malignant or dishonest act, does not encourage evil-doers? Does the Almighty teach us to pardon those who neither atone nor repent? It is not in human nature to suffer unjustly, without wishing retaliation upon the one who caused that suffering, knowingly and unprovoked. Magnanimity may overlook the smart, but strict justice may not demand such magnanimity; and virtue may not frown at the satisfaction of all revenge.

When Adam Stanley, the father of our hero, was on his deathbed, Walter was but six years old. Conscious of the near approach of the dread summoner, he bade the boy call in their nearest neighbor, Mr. Tobias Luroy, who came, and was thus addressed by the dying man:

"I have lived in this miserable wooden hovel but a few months, as you are aware. Reverses of fortune compelled me; and since the death of my beloved wife, and all my children—save Walter the youngest—he has been my sole companion; for I have no kindred this side of the grave. But for him, I should be glad to go; and as my children have had slender frames, I think it will not be long before he will follow me. You are a stranger to me, but as my hour is at hand, I beg to intrust him to your care. You are reputed to be a man of some means, and you may find Walter of sufficient use to you as he grows up, to pay you for the trouble and expense of your support and guardianship. This bank book will place at your control a thousand dollars, the last remnant of my property; a sum which I reserved for his benefit in case I should be suddenly taken away. Take it, and use it in his behalf. Be kind to him. It is my dying prayer; and may the God of the helpless reward you in proportion to your goodness to him."

Tobias Luroy grasped the book and promised. And in a few moments Adam Stanley lay dead before his sobbing boy, and beneath the hard, cold gaze of his neighbor.

The funeral over, Walter Stanley was received into the house of Mr. Luroy. He had a pale face and a delicate frame, but he was a sweet-featured and a bright-eyed boy, and might easily have won his way into the affections of any stranger, had that stranger possessed a heart of ordinary softness. But Tobias Luroy, a sordid creature, whose wife had early died from companionship with his harsh and unsympathetic nature, was incapable of a tender or generous emotion. He was made of piratical stuff, as cruel and relentless as he was avaricious; and wishing that the thousand dollars were disburthened of the boy, he longed for him to die; and to that end became the constant tyrant, instead of protector. During four years of friendless wretchedness, the gentle, harmless stripling found his only home on earth a hell. Whatever inadvertent, childish error he committed was severely punished. His affectionate impulses were repelled; his kind actions unthanked for and unrewarded; and at times he was subjected to torment such as could not have been conceived or put into execution by any but a demoniac heart.

The child was half-starved, ill-clothed, uncared for in sickness, kicked and cuffed when he was comparatively well. No loving glance ever met his own when he looked up to the hard face of his brutish guardian. No playthings, such as all children long for, could he ever call his own. If he ventured out to sport awhile with others of his age, he was sure to be terrified with reprimands or a whipping for it, unless he contrived to do it by stealth; and even when undiscovered, play was almost no play to him, for he mixed in the pastimes with an aching heart, always apprehensive. There was a wild, almost hysteric sadness in his laugh, and the poor boy's face looked almost always frightened. In those games so necessary and so endeared to youth, whenever he thought of Mr. Luroy, his hand trembled at the marbles, or missed the flying ball, sent the arrow wide of the mark, his speed slackened in the race, or his heart and strength and liveliness failed in any boisterous game—he dreaded what might follow!

For trifling indulgences like these, or some ordinary mishap or natural mistake, he would sometimes be locked in a room alone for three days together, with scant bread and water to keep the miserable life within him. At other times his tyrant would take him into the cellar, where a rope and pulley had been rigged up for his especial torment, and after being hauled up to the ceiling, he would receive a merciless flogging, while hanging by the hands; or in that position be lowered and plunged repeatedly into a hog-head of water, till he was nearly drowned; and then be sent, exhausted, supperless and shivering to bed. So completely was he cowed by such treatment, that he dared not reveal it to any one.

"I will murder you, if you ever dare to tell, you young villain!" Luroy would exclaim. "Nobody would believe you, even if you did, poor, friendless wretch that you are, and you would be sure to suffer more. So mind you keep your lips closed, or worse will come to you."

The only real comfort which the poor boy had within doors, was the companionship of a pretty little child, Nelly Edgerly, like him an orphan, and the only offspring of the sister of Mr. Luroy, to whose mercies she had been committed after the death of her parents. Her gambols and prattle—she was two years his junior—and her secret whispers of sympathy caused his aching heart to warm towards her, for she was the only being who witnessed his sufferings, and showed that she was sorry for him. Of all the wide world, little Nellie Edgerly was the only one he could love. Thus God orders one ray of sunshine to illumine even the darkest dungeons of the heart.

At the age of ten, finding that Walter would not die, Luroy determined to get rid of the obdurate youth altogether. Who was to call him to account? He arranged for him to go to sea on a long voyage, as a cabin-boy. Walter had a horror of the sea. He had read in little books of shipwreck, pirates and drowning, and the thought of meeting the terrors of the ocean daily, face to face, nearly drove him mad. He begged not to be sent away; shrieked and cried and clung imploring to the knees of the delighted fiend, who became the more resolved he should go, the more he abhorred it. The captain, too, one John Hardiman, looked like a savage man to the timid, imaginative boy. A tyrant on shore was bad enough, thought Walter; but a tyrant on the lonely, desolate, treacherous, frightful sea—that was a horror he had never thought to have experienced.

"I don't care what you do with him," said the brutal Luroy, roughly, as they parted. "Flog him every day, throw him to the sharks, if you like. Only never bring him back to me again."

"Good-by, Nelly," said the sobbing boy, as they kissed each other's cheeks at parting. "I suppose we shall never see each other again."

"Good-by, Watty, but I hope we shall."

"And I hope not," growled Luroy, pulling her away. "I hope you'll meet the worst of fates," he added, scowling at Walter, "and be food for the fishes before the voyage is over."

The trembling boy of ten went aboard with dismal forebodings; but God who marks the fall of a sparrow, and tempers the wind to the shorn lamb and the slenderest flower, kept watch over the frightened orphan, and through the "dark cloud of heavy sorrow," from that time forth, poured the sunshine of his prospering love. Contrary to his expectation, Walter, in the course of instructions as to his duties as a cabin-boy, found Captain John Hardiman a kind man. He was a rough, bluff, good-hearted Jack tar, and when he heard the history of the boy's ill-treatment, since his father died, he was amazed at the atrocity, and resolved to take the boy under his especial protection, and advance him as fast as possible. Under his kind auspices, Walter soon became divested of all terror at the sea, became strong, hearty and confident; and accompanying the captain on repeated voyages, was made a thorough-bred sailor in every sense of the term, dividing his studies equally between nautical knowledge and the ordinary branches of a common school education, and evincing great powers of application and a rapid proficiency.

A rapid promotion followed, so that at the age of twenty he was placed through the powerful influence of his benefactor, in command of a merchant ship. In this capacity he had ample chances to show his enterprise in trading; and fortune smiling upon his speculation in foreign merchandize, at the age of twenty-two, he found himself a wealthy man. But through all the toils and trials of these years of nautical exile, Walter Stanley never forgot his old persecutor.

Wherever he went, the old scenes of agony were fresh in his memory. The scowling face of the tyrant of his youth was ever present to excite his revengeful hatred, and he determined to have a day of retribution yet. And, as if to keep alive and perpetuate the remembrance of the scenes which he had undergone, while his ship lay in an Italian port, he engaged a celebrated artist to portray upon canvass, at his dictation, several of those scenes which were most painfully recollected by him. The pictures were done to the life, and the tyrant and his victim, suffering and inflicting, were again visible in terrible reality. The unexampled series of portraits were brought home by Captain Stanley, on his last voyage before the time he had set for the consummation of his revenge.

For twelve years he had not visited the city from which he had gone forth a trembling outcast. He was now a strong, bold, handsome and wealthy man, whom even Luroy, who thought him dead by this time, would have failed to recognize. In pursuance of inquiries, he soon ascertained that Luroy still lived in the old house with his niece, who was now grown into the beauty of developed womanhood. But the tyrant had become poor through deserved reverses, and a neighbor informed Captain Stanley that he was about to force a marriage between his comely niece, over whom he exercised a complete domination, and a wealthy merchant to whom she was betrothed, though averse, and through whom Luroy expected, by the sacrifice of Nelly, an ample pecuniary reward.

"You are sure she does not love him?" asked Walter of his informant.

"You would say so, if you could see her pale, sad face," was the reply. "The man has a wolfish and brutal look and behaviour, and is old enough to be the father of the unhappy young lady."

Walter at once wrote to her, appointing time and place for an interview, and it was soon had. Each was amazed at the alteration in the other, and for a long time they dwelt upon the incidents of their youth. Walter recounted his adventures since they had parted, and told her how God had favoured him since he had escaped the clutches of the merciless Luroy.

"But you have not escaped them yet, dear Nelly," continued he. "Yet you may, if it is your will to do so."

"It is indeed! O, how I long for a friend and protector who will save me from a marriage which will be like death to me," exclaimed Nelly, vehemently. "I have suffered the persecution of that fiend, till my heart is well nigh broken."

"You shall suffer it no longer, Nelly. Be mine—be my wife. You are of legal age to choose. And I will make you mine with a double joy, to think that in snatching you from his power and from future wretchedness, it will do much to pay off old scores."

Nelly Edgerly gave a joyful consent, and it was at once decided that the marriage should be solemnized on the following evening, at the house of a friend, and under peculiar circumstances.

The evening came. At midnight the ship of Captain Stanley was to set sail, with the bride and bridegroom on board, for a distant voyage. The move of Walter was a daring one. Darkness had scarcely settled upon the city, when he and four trusty men of his crew called at the house of Luroy, and were admitted by him. Seizing a good opportunity, they gagged, blindfolded, and bound him hand and foot, and lifting him into a carriage, conveyed him to the house where the marriage was to take place. What was his horror and astonishment, when he was placed in a chair and the bandage removed, to see before him Nelly Edgerly, attired as a bride, and clasping the hand of the stranger; the four sailors standing by as witnesses, and a clergyman in the act of performing the marriage ceremony! He struggled violently and strove to make an outcry, but the parties smiled, and he strove in vain. He was compelled to look, and listen to the rites which forever ruined his merciless and mercenary hopes, and which gave his persecuted niece to another than the man to whom he had thought to sacrifice her.

It was a terrible spectacle to him; but other torments were in store and at hand for him. The bride and the clergyman retired together, the latter, according to previous agreement, accompanying Mrs. Stanley on board the ship.

Walter Stanley now advanced and made himself known to the enraged and despairing, but powerless despot of his helpless childhood.

"Tobias Luroy, look well at me! I see you do not know me. I am Walter Stanley—the poor, scourged, terrified and feeble boy, whom after years of atrocious cruelty, you sent adrift to die, or live a miserable life, now stands before you, grown to manhood, and blessed by rank, riches, and a woman's love. He has lived to foil your heart's most cherished plan. Lived to snatch another victim from your hateful grasp, and now to administer to you a bodily punishment such as you so often inflicted upon him, in cowardly and bloody secrecy. Look up, around these walls!" he added, pointing to the frightful pictures which depicted the old atrocities of Luroy, and which had been hung there for the occasion; "don't you recognize yourself and me in each of them? Are they not forcibly depicted? Your heart answers, yes. But here is that which will give force to the delineations. Men, strip the fiend at once, and flog him soundly; for it is my wedding night!"

The four sailors did his stern bidding with a will. Luroy was stripped and scourged with a ship's "cat," in such a prolonged and emphatic manner as caused him to remember to the end of a miserable existence, the kindred treatment he had inflicted upon the orphan boy.

"The hour of vengeance is over now," said Stanley, to the writhing knave, "and I am satisfied. Your disgrace is complete. I have saved an angel from your pitiless avarice, and I am fully revenged. We leave this place forever, Tobias Luroy, and may this hour never fade from your memory. Men, take him home to his vacant den again."

The justly punished wretch was borne to his dwelling accordingly. The pictures—unique memorials of childhood's days—were then borne aboard the ship, where a wedding collation was being enjoyed by the crew. The clergyman took his leave, and within an hour the gallant craft, her white wings spread to a propitious breeze, was bounding fast and far over the dancing waters. Walter Stanley was revenged at last; nor did the confounded spirit of Tobias Luroy ever lead him to seek from law that redress which would have given publicity to his crimes, and made him a scorned example before all the world.

THE FRENCH EMPRESS.

The family of Guzman (of which the French Empress is a descendant) is one of the most illustrious and historic houses in Europe; being the parent stock from which have sprung the Dukes of Medina de las Torres, the Dukes of Medina Sidonia, and the Counts and Dukes of Olivares, and the Marquises and Counts of Montijo, Counts of Theba, and Grandees of Spain. In addition to the name of Guzman, her majesty is entitled to that of Portocarrero, which recalls likewise great historical associations. The empress is not the first of her race who has been called to a throne; in 1663, Donna Louisa Francisca de Guzman married the King of Portugal, Don Juan IV of Braganza.—Burke's Vicissitudes.

TOBACCO AND ARSENIC.

A young lady in Hampshire fell into the mistake of eating a portion of arsenic, which had been prepared for the destruction of rats. Painful symptoms soon led to the discovery. An elderly lady then present advised that she should be made to vomit as soon as possible, and as the unfortunate victim had always exhibited a loathing for tobacco in any shape, that was suggested as a ready means of producing a desired end. A pipe was used, but this produced no nausea. A large portion of strong tobacco was then chewed and the juice swallowed; but even this produced no sensation of disgust. A strong decoction was then made with hot water; of this she drank a pint, without producing nausea or giddiness, or any emetic or cathartic action. The pains gradually subsided, and she began to feel well. On the arrival of physicians, an emetic was administered. The patient recovered, and no ill consequences were experienced. Another case occurred a few years subsequent at the same place, when tobacco was administered, and no other remedy. In this instance there was complete and perfect recovery. From this it may be reasonably concluded, that tobacco is an antidote of very safe and ready application in cases of poisoning by arsenic.—M. C. Cooke.

AN UNRELIABLE WITNESS.

There are some who are so unwilling to admit the truths of the Bible, as often to show great credulity in believing what they think will destroy the testimony of the Scriptures. A Mr. Leonard Horner has recently demonstrated, as he thought, from discoveries he made in Egypt, that man has existed on the earth for twenty thousand years. At the base of a statue in Memphis, of one of the Pharaohs, whom he supposed to have reigned about 1360 years before Christ, he found an accumulation of nine feet four inches of Nile mud; adding to that 1854, the date of his excavation, he has 3214 years for the accumulation, making the rate of increase three and a half inches a century. Making deeper excavations, he found, at the depth of thirty-nine feet, a piece of pottery, from which he and other learned men concluded that man must have existed 13,371 years before 1854. The London Literary Gazette, in demonstrating the fallacy of this assumption, states that this very statue was upright and uninjured only six centuries ago, being described by an Arab historian who visited it then; so that the sediment must have accumulated in less than six centuries, instead of more than thirty, and the other calculations based upon it fall to the ground.—N. Y. World.

To gather Perfume of Flowers.

Gather the flowers with as little stalk as possible, and place them in a jar, three parts full of olive or almond oil. After being in the oil twenty-four hours, put them into a coarse cloth and squeeze the oil from them. This process with fresh flowers is to be repeated according to the strength of the perfume desired. The oil, being thus thoroughly perfumed with the volatile principle of the flowers, is to be mixed up with an equal quantity of pure, rectified spirits, and shaken every day for a fortnight, when it may be poured off, ready for use.

MY BOYHOOD'S HAUNTS.

BY WILL ALLEN.

Ah, here's the very tree, whose shade
Spreads o'er the noisy rill;
And here's the bridge that nature made,
That touches just the hill.
Beneath this tree, in bygone days,
I sat and whiled away
The hours that were so sunny then,
So dear to me and gay.

And here's the rock, moss-grown and gray,
I likened to a tower;
The rock is just the same, and grass
Sprouts at its base, and flowers.
There below me, in the dingle,
Where grow the daisies sweet,
I'd hide myself, and dream away
The hours that were so fleet.

The old mill-wheel, that flung the spray
Like jewels all around,
Is quiet now, and lying low
Upon the weedy ground.
The mill of stone is standing yet,
But going to decay—
The mill I used to love so well,
And where I used to play.

The miller, now grown old and gray,
Will soon sleep in the tomb,
And flowers bright, and flowers rare,
Shall o'er him sweetly bloom;
For once I used to love him well.
When young, and strong, and hale:
He's neither hale, nor strong, nor young,
He's old, and gray, and pale!

He scarce remembers now the boy
That used to come each day,
To chat with him, and laugh, and sing,
And work, and call it play!
He says I've grown so old since then,
So changed in every way,
He scarce believes I was the boy
"That worked, and called it play!"

O boyhood hours, forever passed!
Why flew ye by so swift?
Ye never will return to me—
Ne'er to return ye drift!
I miss one who, in summer days,
Would always come with me,
And sing and laugh the time away,
Here underneath this tree!

I miss him now—and O, he sleeps
Down in a turfy bed.
And daisies sweet, and harebells blue,
Are sprouting o'er his head!
O, by his side, when I am called
To rest my weary feet,
There lay my head where now they bloom—
Harebells and daisies sweet!

"O, DEAR!"

AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY MRS. M. T. CALDOR.

"O, DEAR!" The words came in a dreary, wistful tone, as though the speaker's heart were burdened with grief and care, and raising a slender white hand, fairer and softer than many a score of those who termed themselves the ladies of the town, in whose precincts he stood, the speaker brushed off with his delicate cambric handkerchief the great drops of perspiration on his forehead. Not, by the way, the beaded pearls of honest sweat, well-earned by manly toil; but the hot, steaming exhalations of inward feverish fretting.

"O, dear!" The words came again, heartily, with more and increasing pain. What inward grief could thus distress that fine, elegant-looking young man, leaning so listlessly against the trunk of the noble elm tree shading the entrance to one of those tasteful country retreats, so charming and refreshing alike to the eye of the stranger pedestrian passing by and the proud gaze of its wealthy city owner?

It was not sickness, surely. The manly form was gracefully upright, the complexion clear and pure, the lips full and rosy with the beauteous freshness of health. It was not poverty, for the whole apparel showed a lavish purse, and one needed not to follow the diamond-circled finger into the pocket to which it idly clung, to read in the bank books nestling there the goodly sums set down to the credit of Henry Ireson, Esq. Certainly the blighting effects of care and want had never reached him.

Neither did it seem possible it could be inward wickedness and sin that with ghostly reproaches kept the soul haunted by an unquiet distress. The dark blue eye had an honest clearness, the broad forehead an open ingenuousness, and the finely-shaped head betrayed too many noble characteristics.

Wherefore, then, the dissatisfied frown, and the impatient vexation his manner betrayed? Hark, he will explain himself. Idly brushing off with his cane the poor clover blossoms in the grass beside him, and watching a bright-eyed robin pecking cautiously at a branch of berries, and an earnest bee, keeping undeviatingly on his track of duty, he soliloquized aloud:

"O, dear!" everything and everybody is busy, and here am I, strong, lazy fellow that I am, without anything before me, from sunrise to sunset, day in and day out, actually sighing and groaning for some one to give a little work to do. What a life I lead! Beginning the day when thousands of happy fellows are half through a forenoon's work. Yawning over my pillow as long as possible, and then yawning over my breakfast, which I spin out so long, just for the sake of whiling away time, that impatient waiters and my own digestive organs alike groan at the protracted demand. Then a cigar, maybe two, and a stroll somewhere, round the garden with sister Belle, or over the park with her husband. Perhaps I get up a little interest in one or the other, and would like right well to take hold in good earnest with my own hands at some suggested improvement. But no, that would be interfering with Mr. Gardener's privilege, and haven't I seen, times enough, the look of injured dignity he can assume, mingled with a contemptuous pity for my ignorance, that makes me long to show him I understand the art of boxing thoroughly, if nothing else? Well, to go on with the ennobling routine. Then I have the horse brought round. I do enjoy that daily drive, every minute of it. There is a keen delight following after my noble Sultan's flying feet. But at length I have mercy on him, and send him back to the stable. Next dressing up for dinner, and dinner itself, a proscribed, formal, tiresome affair—even if there are stranger guests, they are sure to be just such puny, good-for-nothings as myself, and the talk will be stupid and dull, and everybody will be immensely relieved when it is over. Then another cigar, maybe a nap on the arbor lounge, or else in the drawing-room, trying to entertain myself, and a set of foolish walking bales of silks, laces and jewelry, yclept fashionable ladies, who sit gazing at each other, or thrumming the piano, instead of having sensible work to make the time fly swiftly, and the conversation sparkle off naturally and cheerfully. And the day finishes off at the opera, or some crowded levee, or party. That's fashionable life! Not a good deed done, not a useful act performed, not an ennobling virtue acquired. Good Heavens, it is monstrous, it is wicked! I despise myself. Better far throw the legacy of my father into the fire, so that the imperative necessity for bread and butter shall force me to be a man. Ah, see, there goes a happy fellow. His dinner pail on his arm, he's off for a day's work. A carpenter, I judge. I think I saw him at work yesterday at Emmerton's new building. What a manly-looking fellow he is—such broad shoulders and brawny arms. Well may he hold up his head so proudly. He fills his place in the world worthily, and when he dies will be mourned and missed. Heigh-ho!"

The carpenter, a tall, intelligent looking man, came along the roadside toward the tree where the young man stood. Just then a clear, childish voice rang out behind him:

"Papa! Papa!"

Turning at once with a suddenly kindling smile that did not escape the notice of Henry Ireson, he called out:

"Why, Susie, you elf, have you followed me all this way? Run back again, child. Mother will be frightened."

A blue-eyed, curly-headed cherub of six or seven years clung to his knees, half-laughing with the joy of reaching him, half-crying at the fancied slight.

"O, papa, you didn't kiss Susie. Susie wants her kiss."

"Silly puss." And the child, crowing with delight, was swung far above his head in those strong arms, and two or three hearty kisses bestowed on the sweet roe-bud lips. "There, Susie, now run back, and keep on the side of the street."

"How soon will you come back, papa? You said you'd fix my garden for me, and Auntie Mary's flowers; but you haven't."

"I know it, darling, but you see poor papa is busy at work all the time to get the bread and butter for his little chickies. I'll try and get a chance to do a little to-night." A shade of care crossed his face, and he repeated discontentedly, "There's always so much to be done when I can get a minute. If I only had a few days to myself! 'O, dear!'"

The tone revealed a host of toilsome, wearying exertions. He sighed again, dismally, "O, dear!"

A mellow laugh startled him, and turning about he perceived, for the first time, the young gentleman beneath the elm tree, his handsome face dimpled with smiles, while he said, bowing respectfully:

"I beg your pardon, sir; but the coincidence was rather amusing, and provoked a laugh from me. Here was I just now giving just as forlorn and doleful an 'O, dear' as yours, because I had nothing in the world to do; while your trouble seems to lie in the opposite direction."

The mechanic recognized a true gentleman in the friendly bearing of the stranger, and gave a friendly smile in return.

"I think I would like to try your case a little while. It is soonest mended," he answered readily.

Young Ireson smiled bitterly. "Mayhap, mayhap, yet Heaven knows it were folly for you to wish for so pitiful an estate as mine. Be happy, man. You should know how I envied you as I saw your eager, earnest face coming along the street."

After a moment's curious gaze into the speaker's face, the carpenter seemed intuitively to divine his thoughts.

"Ay," he said, gravely, "you are right. I should always be happy, and there's many a blessing any man might rejoice to possess."

While he spoke he glanced back at the white-walled cottage peeping forth from a distant line of trees, and then at the rosy, childish face brimming with so much love and sweetness.

"I am almost always gay as a lark, and it is only now and then I get discouraged, seeing so much ahead that needs tending to. But it's all right. Plenty of work keeps off gloom and mischief both, and if there's work ahead, so is there time, too. But the latter commodity is precious with me, as you know, therefore I must bid you good-morning. Run along home, Susie."

"Stay, suppose we try and relieve each other. What was it little Susie wanted. Can't I help her a little?"

It was a doubtful smile Carleton the mechanic gave, as his eye glanced at the glossy broadcloth coat, and the white hands of the questioner. A flush mounted to the young gentleman's forehead.

"Nay, nay, my friend," he said, half humbly, half defiantly, "there are muscles under the skin, if it is delicate and womanish. One of these days it may become an arm not to be despised. At all events, from this hour I am fully resolved its energies shall not wither away for want of exercise. Will you take me for little Susie's apprentice?"

"Ay, ay," was the hearty answer, "you're one of the right sort to succeed in anything when you once undertake it. I can safely predict Susie's flower-bed will eclipse all the rest of the garden. Do you understand, Susie, this kind gentleman is ready to work for you?"

Little Susie did understand, and with one bright, shy glance nestled her hand confidently in his, and led merrily toward her home. Highly entertained at this sudden turn of affairs, Henry Ireson followed his prattling guide into the wide garden behind the cosy nest of a cottage, nor was he dismayed when the little one pointed gleefully to a neglected bed, where tall flaunting weeds and luxuriant clover quite overawed and crowded out the pale and sickly flower-roots.

"Only see," cried Susie, after a hasty run into the house to inform "mother" of the unexpected gardener she had found, "the naughty weeds keep growing, growing, so greedy, just like selfish boys and girls, papa says, and they eat up all the sunshine, and drink away all the dew from my poor little flowers, so they are all starving."

And Susie prattled, and Henry worked. With a right good will he threw off the warm coat, and grasped the spade, and though his fair forehead crimsoned, and broad blisters gathered on his tender hands, he did not desist from his work until a nicely spaded bed was prepared, and the flower-roots carefully transplanted. Then he paused, and taking out his repeater discovered the hour.

"So late!" cried he; "is it possible?"

Susie had heard a well-known whistle. "Jamie has come," cried she, and rushed away. She re-appeared in a moment, followed by her mother.

"Would the gentleman please come in for a luncheon? Please do, please do!" she cried, clapping her tiny hands in delight.

Only a moment Henry Ireson hesitated, then he followed quietly, smiling inwardly at his novel position, when he found himself seated at the little table spread with snowy bread, crumbly cake, golden butter and delicious strawberries and cream, little Susie on one side, and bright, intelligent Jamie on the other.

Mrs. Carleton was busy with her babe in an adjoining room, but occasionally her gentle, refined-looking face peeped in at the door to see if anything was needed.

"This is sensible new," soliloquized Ireson. "What an appetite one can get up when there's not a score of dishes to sicken one with satiety before the meal has fairly commenced. When have I eaten so heartily as this?"

Here a shout of delight from Jamie, and a rush of Susie's toward the door startled him. "Mary's come, Mary's come," cried their united voices.

Turning to the door to see who Mary might be, actually, the refined, travelled, elegant Henry Ireson blushed like an awkward rustic before the apparition standing there. And yet it was only a slight, girlish form, arrayed in some light muslin, with a little sprig of blue meandering over its clear white folds. A beautiful face, to be sure, set off by glossy bands of rich brown hair, and brightened by a pair of large, wonderfully soft dark eyes. She came in with lady-like ease and self-possession, bowing courteously to the stranger, and softly returning the ardent caresses lavished upon her. Mrs. Carleton, hearing the tumultuous glee of the children, came in at once.

"Ah, you are home early. My sister Mary, sir," she said, introducingly.

"I beg your pardon, madam," returned the young gentleman with a bow of recovered ease. "I am ashamed I have not informed you before, my name is Ireson, and I am a brother of your nearest neighbor, Mrs. Greenwood."

A free and lively conversation ensued, wherein Susie and her flower-bed received prominent attention, and the young gentleman was alike charmed by the arch vivacity and varied intelligence of the village schoolmistress, as to his unbounded astonishment he soon discovered the new comer to be.

Before he made his adieu, quite an extensive programme had been arranged. Choice plants had been voluntarily promised them, and Susie was nearly wild with delight at the prospect of a summer house, and an arbor for her own exclusive use. One could scarcely tell which was the brighter, her little face, or the animated countenance of her unsalaried workman, as he sauntered along toward the Greenwood estate, with a light, buoyant step, humming a gay snatch of song, so utterly unlike the moody, irritable youth who had left the avenue that morning.

"Who would believe a little hard work can have such magical effect?" ruminated he. "And to think I have been so dull and stupid all this time, and that charming family so near. I'll make up for lost time now. A famous place they shall have there by-and-by; if I choose to spend labor and money both, who has the right to find fault? I could see how fond of books that charming Mary was. She shall have plenty, now, on some pretence. Well, well, I wonder what would Bell say if she knew all this?"

Bell was his sister, Mrs. Greenwood, the fashionable mistress of the stately mansion. She met him in the hall, adorned with an airy profusion of silk, gauze, ribbons and flounces.

"Why, Harry, how disordered and warm you look! Pray hurry away to your room. Did you know Miss Morton had arrived? Ah, she is as graceful and lovely as a Venus. Just the parti for you. Such a rare opportunity as you will have. Be particular about your toilet for dinner, and hurry away, or you'll not be in season. But, bless me, what ails your hands? What horrible blisters—how shocking!"

Her brother laughed at her consternation, and gazing down affectionately into the swollen, scarlet streaked palms, said proudly:

"You would scarcely understand, Bell, so there's no use in my telling you; never hero was prouder of scars won bravely in battle than I of these selfsame blisters. Never mind, don't fret, sister mine. I'll be in season for dinner and Miss Morton both."

So he was. Smiling, handsome and gentlemanly, the beautiful belle of the neighboring city gave him undivided attention while he handed her out to the dining-room, and exerted herself to the utmost to please and charm him. Yet, notwithstanding her brilliant conversation, her dazzling beauty and elegant toilet, there would occasionally an absent, pre-occupied look come over his face that piqued and annoyed her. So also, when he followed her to the drawing-room, in answer to his sister's whispered entreaty, and turned the music leaves, while her white, gem-decked fingers wandered with swift dexterity over the piano keys, she could not resist giving many a furtive glance over her shoulder, to see if it were real, or only existed in her imagination, his air of lofty disdain for the trifling employment.

When Mrs. Greenwood descended the staircase the next morning, she met her brother again in the hall, looking as bright and rosy as if he had just quaffed an exhilarating draught from Aurora's radiant fingers. And so he had. Firm in his new resolutions, when he first awoke, instead of settling himself more comfortably on his pillow, he had sprang up from bed, dressed, and hurried out into the fresh air. Nay, even more, he walked briskly down the avenue, along the roadside toward the white cottage of Carpenter Carleton. A snowy-wreathed column of smoke was rising from the little chimney, and mingling with the fleecy morning clouds, while from the garden plot came the sound of the quick, even strokes of a hoe, and through the lilac hedge he caught a glimpse of a pink cambric dress.

Then said the young gentleman, inwardly, "Ah, there is Carleton at work there. I will go and have a chat with him." Not a word to be hinted, with that suddenly leaping pulse, of the supposition he might have arrived at, concerning the pink cambric dress.

Therefore, he looked delighted, surprised, when pretty Mary Carleton was discovered by her brother's side, actually filling a basket with the weeds he had dug away. She looked up rather startled, yet in smiling welcome.

"Good-morning, sir," said Mr. Carleton. "Mary and I are trying to get our garden bed along so Susie's shall not shame it. You, too, are enjoying this splendid morning air. I fancy you worked pretty steadily yesterday, and I was half inclined to mistrust that one experiment would satisfy you for the present."

"By no means. I am exceedingly anxious to continue, and I walked in to get some directions from you. Consider me an apprentice, if you please, and tell me what I shall do next. I want to build a little summer-house in the corner there, to cover over with climbing roses for Susie and Jamie. Ah, Miss Carleton, you, too, are an early riser. You see I am like the bad penny, soon returned."

Carleton looked a little embarrassed. He scarcely liked to receive such a favor from a stranger to whom he could make no little return, and he did not wish to seem ill-natured in refusing, but the young gentleman divined his feelings, and said frankly:

"I beg you will not think there is any obligation about the affair, except on my part. Positively, it is for my own personal enjoyment that I proposed it. I am spending the few months previous to the date fixed for my departure on an European tour, with my sister, Mrs. Greenwood, and thus far the time has dragged heavily on my hands. Moreover, I am sick and disgusted with fashionable life, and ashamed of my own puerile uselessness in the world. Give me the opportunity to commence instructing myself, and allow me to be the means of assistance to some one, for the first time in my life. For Susie's sake you must not refuse me."

"No," said Mary Carleton, suddenly, her dark eye kindling, and her whole speaking face illumined with the flush of a noble sentiment, "my brother shall not refuse you. So praiseworthy a resolution must not be checked. A man has no right to be indolent and useless in a world so full of work as this. I shall answer for my brother, and myself install you as our head gardener."

"Thank you," returned Henry, enthusiastically, "I accept the situation from your hands. Remember, you are my employer, now."

"I'll not interfere with that arrangement," laughed her brother. "So, then, Mary, Mr. Ireson must look to you for the remuneration for his services."

"Ay," repeated Henry, with an arch glance into her blushing face, "remember, I shall look to you for remuneration."

She laughed away the momentary confusion. "I promise you there shall be work enough to keep you busy. I shall have a perfect bower of blossoms, and mayhap occasionally give you less romantic work; for instance, the large gate yonder is too heavy and awkward. I have been teasing my brother this long time to make two of it, so as to swing easily at the touch. Now that I have a journeyman always at my call, the improvements I shall plan will be endless."

How lovely she looked! so sweet and fair, and artless, yet with all mingled such pure, womanly dignity. The neat cambric dress in its simplicity setting off the slender figure as prettily as the broad hat the glossy wealth of tresses parted smoothly away from the open forehead.

Henry wondered to see the neat pink folds unstained by the dew, until he noticed how carefully Carleton threw the weeds out upon the gravelled walk, so she need not approach the dampness, and the thoughtfulness of the one little act showed plainly the tenderness of the tie that bound the brother to his sweet little sister. When the children came out, fresh and rosy from the bath, Henry had a dozen opportunities for remarking the quiet, playful tact of the pretty school teacher, keeping them so happy and contented at their play, without a single jarring discord. The moment she perceived their presence was likely to be troublesome where their father and Mr. Ireson were marking off the arbor plan, without any allusion to that fact, she pointed out a robin's tiny nest in the fir tree, and away they flew to examine it.

So, too, she managed to draw Mr. Ireson into the house without his being at all aware of the motive. Would he fasten the rose on the piazza where she could not reach it? and then would he tend to another little errand in the house? And so he was led triumphantly to the snowily draped table, upon which was steaming a plate of fine large perch, browned to a charm, with the crisp fried potatoes by its side, and a roll of foam-white bread, and a cup of fragrant coffee.

"Don't I mistrust that genteel breakfast hours are scarcely compatible with the appetite of my journeyman?" was her gay response to his hesitating look. "Sister Martha, yonder, has a wonderful gift at cooking the fish, which I am just as dexterous in catching."

"You—are these the trophies of your angling skill?"

"Yes, I must plead guilty to a love of the sport. Just imagine how nonplussed I was, a little while ago, while lecturing a group of my school children on the wickedness of stoning the dear old robins that build their nest near us, to hear a bright, smart little fellow say, 'Please, marm, don't the fish love to live just as well as the birds? and missis had a whole basket full the other day.'"

A hearty laugh all around removed any restraint Henry might have felt at trespassing again on their hospitality, and such a breakfast as that, thought he, would never be eaten again, except in Utopia. Then when the young lady took down her hat and satchel, declaring it was school time, and she must be away, young Ireson discovered that his sister would be exceedingly alarmed, if he should not appear at the morning meal, and accompanied her as far as the Greenwood mansion. His fair companion glanced admiringly up the avenue.

"It is a lovely place, I have always admired it."

He looked to see if there was any envious glances, and longing hopes; but no, the clear dark eye shone hopefully, and a genial smile illuminated the whole face.

"Good-morning," he said, thoughtfully. "I shall take a peep at the school house some day."

She lifted the satchel roguishly. "There is a ferele here."

He waited till the straw hat disappeared behind the hedge of bushes ere he turned up the avenue. As I have said, in the hall of the house he met his sister, pale, languid and sleepy still, just descended from her chamber.

"Well, Harry, what do you think of her? Isn't she charming?"

"Charming indeed," he answered, warmly, and then stammered, "Stay, of whom were you speaking?"

"Miss Morton, Annie Morton, of course."

"O!" Just a shade of comical smile about the well-formed lips.

"Yes, of course you admire her, every one does. She remains with us several days, and if you are wise, you will improve so favorable an opportunity."

She was interrupted by the lady herself. In a soft, emerald-hued morning robe, richly trimmed, and giving a dainty glimpse of rare French embroidery beneath, Miss Morton languidly descended the stairs. Greeting them with a gracious smile she glided toward the verandah, remarking on the fineness of the morning. Henry followed, roguishly inquiring how she ascertained the fact.

"From my chamber window, of course," was the gay reply, "have you any better authority?"

"Indeed, I have; full three hours of this freshest and most invigorating air makes me competent to pronounce it a delightful day."

"Indeed, I was not aware you were such an early riser. How do you busy yourself so long before other people are away from their beds?"

He smiled—such a sparkling, happy smile, the lady instantly determined to ascertain if possible where and how his mornings were spent—and answered evasively:

"I assure you, I have scarcely known happier, rosier-winged hours in all my life than the three just flown away. But let me escort you to the breakfast-room; and how is it about the ride I promised you to-day?"

The rest of the day was devoted to the company in the house, more especially, the fair lady guest of his sister. She was a showy, brilliant girl, and had she arrived a fortnight sooner, I am not sure by that time she might not have worn the diamond circlet that heralds the less showy but more enduring wedding ring, proclaiming to the world Mrs. Henry Ireson. But now— Well, upon their ride that afternoon, they passed a little brown school house, shaded by a fine grove of oak and elm trees. Just then, at the open window, they had a glimpse of a slight figure, robed in pale pink cambric, and could see distinctly the glossy brown braids and spotless linen collar, as well as the small book held in her outstretched hand, while a monotonous, sing-song humming proclaimed that some hopeful urchin was reciting a well-conned lesson.

Miss Morton raised a delicately gloved hand to throw back the elegant lace veil, and follow his eager eye to the school house window.

"Poor little schoolmistress! how I pity her, immured in that steaming room this warm day," said she. "What a hard life it must be—so trying and wearisome—wearing away one's life and health, and disposition. After all, it is a terrible thing to be poor!"

Henry Ireson was bending out, looking back at the school house, so he only answered indifferently, "Do you think so?" which his companion decidedly resented, inasmuch as she had congratulated herself on a pretty and effective speech. How should she be able to guess the emptiness of her words, to one who had that very morning beheld the bright face, and witnessed the unceasing cheerfulness and general usefulness of the identical teacher who had called forth her pitying sympathy?

Thus week after week slipped away, and Henry Ireson, between his hours of earnest labor at the Carletons, and the assiduous attentions required by Miss Morton, who still lingered a guest at the house, found little opportunity for dullness or ennui, and certainly his eye had never sparkled before with such joyous brightness, or his step acquired such elastic buoyancy. Once in a while his sister would say, pettishly:

"I don't see where you are, or what you are about so much of the time when you are missing here. Annie Morton fancies there is a lady attraction, but I don't see how that can be. One thing, I know you have a queer way about you, and very odd ideas, lately, and you are getting brown as a gipseey."

"Do I look any the worse for a little healthy tanning?" asked he, gaily brushing away a mass of curly hair, and peeping saucily into her face, looking so handsome as he did so, that spite of her vexation, she smiled upon him with proud affection.

"Well, but, Henry, somehow I don't feel easy about you. You don't seem to like Annie Morton as well as I expected—you disappoint me. What has come over you lately?" she asked, complainingly.

"Like her? Why, I've no antipathy against Miss Morton. I think she is a fine girl. Indeed, I like her very much."

"Like her! Ah, yes, but that is not exactly what I mean. How pleasant it would be for you to take a bride with you to Europe, Harry!"

He gave a long, low whistle. "Well, sure enough, perhaps it would. Thank you for a new idea, sister Bell."

That very afternoon he said to Miss Morton, while assisting her to cut the flowers for her evening bouquet:

"My sister proposes a new idea, Miss Morton, that I should take a companion with me to Europe. What think you?"

A slight flush tinged the delicate cheek of the high-bred lady, but she answered composedly, with a coquettish air of indifference:

"Indeed, you yourself are the best judge of that. European tours are usually entertaining, though I scarcely think I could be very enthusiastic concerning one."

He handed her a last spray of heliotrope, and said no more. Later, while the fashionable belle was busy with her dressing-maid, preparing for the evening party at a neighboring hall, he stood with little Mary Carleton and Jamie beneath the tasteful arbor he had framed, within the garden his labor and purse too had beautified and adorned. A welcome and valued friend he had become, beloved and respected by every one, without a thought of his superior rank and wealth.

"Did you ever imagine you would like traveling in the other hemisphere, Mary, or are you a home-bird that would never sally far from the parent nest? Do you know how soon I shall be on my way to the grand old scenes of historic renown?"

Her soul-lit eyes were fixed dreamily on the full moon passing silently and majestically on her pathway through the ether blue. Something of the glorious effulgence of the silvery light that flooded the scene, kindled on her face, the cheek flushed, the eye glowed, the fresh lips trembled with eagerness.

"I? Ah, has it not been the goal of my fondest desires ever since I was a tiny child and could trace out the different countries on my map? The grand old ocean, the famous cities, the majestic rivers, the towering mountains! Such unspeakable delight as takes away my breath even to imagine. O, Mr. Ireson, you will see them all; how I congratulate you!" she said, enthusiastically.

Henry Ireson smiled with an eager, joyful meaning she scarcely comprehended.

"Jamie, my boy," said he, with some heartfelt emotion lending a quiver to his mellow voice, "run in and see if mother isn't calling you."

And then—ah, such scenes were never meant for a careless pen or heedless ear—be content, dear reader, to know, a few days afterward, Henry Ireson entered his sister's boudoir, with an odd look of embarrassment and confusion on his face. He made an assault upon her worsted basket for the first moment, twisting together the bright-hued skeins until she quietly withdrew the basket from his mischievous fingers. Then he began disinterring from their velvet beds the jewels in her casket, and when these were also removed, attacked a perfume box, rattling together the crystal flasks until his sister, wincing nervously, exclaimed:

"Have mercy upon my bijouterie, Harry. I never saw you behave so strangely. What is the matter with you?"

He laughed away the awkward confusion, and said boldly:

"I may as well out with it at once. You see, Bell, all this time I've been trying to find a good way to give you a good piece of news. So, then, here it is. I have concluded to accept your advice, and take a bride with me to Europe."

"Is it possible? Ah, that's a dear good fellow, Harry! That sly little Annie never liased a word of it. I must run and scold her while I congratulate you."

"For a very good reason she said nothing, my dear sister, she is not yet aware of the fact."

"How—what? I don't understand."

"How should you understand, if you do not ask the name of my fair betrothed?"

"I supposed, of course, it was Annie Morton. Who else should it be?"

"It happens to be another person. Perhaps you have heard of Miss Mary Carleton?"

"A daughter of Judge Carleton, of H——?"

His voice grew hurried and excited. He knew very well what was coming.

"Quite another family, Bell. Have you ever noticed the teacher of the village school. She passes here every day!"

Alarm and consternation swept away her previous surprise, but he was too much interested to laugh at her comically rueful face.

"You don't mean—it can't be—O, Henry Ireson, that low-bred, ignorant schoolmistress is not to be your wife, my sister?"

Now that the crisis was at hand he grew wonderfully cool and calm.

"No, Bell, it is not possible that any one low-bred or ignorant will be my wife, consequently your sister. Mary Carleton is neither; but she is my betrothed wife. Stop, stop, Bell, spare me that burst of indignation and reproach, and listen to me. First, then, as you know, I am fortunately dependent upon no one, and consequently can act my own will. Secondly, the most insolent tirade from you cannot move me a single inch from my unbounded love and admiration for so sweet, and refined, and lovely a girl as she; and finally, I can assure you it is my solemn belief that when I return from Europe with Mrs. Ireson, you will be even more proud of her grace and beauty than I myself. Now what do you say? You understand the case perfectly. We are all that is left of a numerous family, it would be sad to have coldness and alienation come between us, nevertheless, I will bear no cool treatment toward my wife that is to be. Come, come, Bell, be a sensible woman, and acquiesce gracefully where it is folly to rebel."

She gave a long drawn sigh, a searching glance into his resolute face, and burst into tears. Nevertheless, not quite a year from that time, Mrs. Greenwood gave a grand party at her town residence, in honor of the return to their native land, of Mr. and Mrs. Ireson, and most loving and attentive and admiring was her demeanor toward the latter, of whom, by the way, many a rumor had come back to her native land, reporting the flattering attentions her graceful dignity and unusual loveliness had received from foreign dignitaries, all of which lost nothing of their importance when repeated by Mrs. Greenwood to her fashionable friends. It was "my charming Mary," "my beautiful sister," now, not a word about the "low-bred, ignorant schoolmistress."

Miss Morton, still unmarried, was at that same levee. When she paid her next visit to her friend's country seat, a palatial residence had been erected between the Carleton's cottage and the Greenwood estate, to which she received many a cordial invitation, but strange to tell, she always refused; perhaps because with high-bred contempt she noticed the extreme intimacy of the two households—the humble cottage and the grand country seat.

"And all this," said Mr. Carleton, a dozen times to his smiling wife, "all this has come from that sultry morning, and my lugubrious exclamation, 'O, DEAR!'"

THE VALUE OF 'OZONE.'

What people have done instinctively, science seems to confirm; for going to the seashore and to the hill countries, they go where ozone is most abundant. This word ozone is perhaps a puzzler to many of our readers, and requires some explanation. Shortly, it is the term applied to a recently discovered principle, existing in greater or less intensity in the atmosphere—in greater, in those situations, as on the seashore or on lofty mountains, where the air is most pure—in less, where, as in large cities, it is less pure. It seems more than probable that this ozone is the oxygen gas of the atmosphere in a peculiar condition; but whether it is so or no, its existence in greater or less proportion is evidently closely connected with health. As we are digressing into this scientific explanation, we may as well embrace the opportunity to impress upon our readers how greatly health is influenced for good, especially in the feeble, by free exposure, not only to good air, but to the diffused light of day. This is not the place to discuss the subject, or to bring proofs of what is an undoubted fact, so pray take it upon our testimony—pray act upon it; we know not, even yet, how much the chemical rays of sunlight influence our well-being, so pray, reader, remember when we talk of fresh air, we mean plenty of sunlight as well.—Dr. Thompson's Health Resorts.

A REAL RELISHER OF A JOKE.

A man lately received twenty lashes, well laid on, at the whipping-post in an English town. The culprit, instead of bellowing when the constable applied the lash, laughed immoderately, which made the angry officer lay on with harder force. On giving him his twentieth, blow, the angry officer could stand it no longer.

"Well, look here, mister," said the offended officer, "I've done my duty, and I can lick ye no more, but I'd like to know what it is that's so funny?"

"Funny!" roared the other; "why, it's excellent. You've got the wrong Smith! I aint the man that was to be whipped! It's the other one. Now you'll have to go it all over again! Really, it's too good! You must lick the other man! Ha, ha!"—London Punch.

LOVE OF ORNAMENT.

The love of ornament creeps slowly but surely into the female heart. A girl who twines the lily in her tresses, and looks at herself in the clear stream, will soon wish that the lily were fadeless and the stream a mirror. We say, let the young girl seek to adorn her beauty, if she be taught also to adorn her mind and heart, that she may have wisdom to direct her love of ornament in due moderation.—Ladies' Book.

REVENGE.

My revenge
Was born in laughter (as our highest delights
Of bluish at first through tears); but 'twill endure,
Like oaks which, born in May, seem slight and weak,
But having a score of winters on their heads,
Grow strong and rugged—so doth my revenge!
Nought shall impoverish it. The bounteous years
Shall lend their seasons and apparel it;
And, lest its roots should e'er be loosed by pity,
We'll water it well with blood!—BARRY CORNWALL.

The Trials of a Near-Sighted Man.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

I AM near-sighted; and when I have written that, I have confided to you the chief difficulty of my life. Near-sightedness is to me the root of all evil. I have nothing to say against the honored proverb that declares money to be that root; I know nothing in favor, or against that assertion, having never been possessed of a sufficient quantity of that particular "root," to satisfy myself of its nature. And here, permit me to introduce myself to the reader. My name is Jehoiakim Wilson; but people having a dislike to use their vocal organs unnecessarily, have abbreviated my cognomen, and I am generally known as Hoke Wilson. A decided improvement over my baptismal title, I think.

At the early age of fifteen, I began to be near-sighted. Whether this infirmity was caused by disease of the visual organ, or by the practice of reading novels by twilight—to which I was addicted—I cannot say, but I think these after sunset readings had the greater share in producing the unfortunate result. And here, young people, allow me to warn you one and all, to let books alone at all hours when the light is dim, or the air thick and cloudy. If you are blest with eyes, take care of them, for if your life extends to the half of fourscore, you will find that good eyesight is worth more than a knowledge of all the novels in creation. I'd rather a son of mine would have the full power of his eyes, than be versed in all the foreign tongues that made Babel horrible.

The first that I discovered of my affliction, was one evening when I went out to walk by moonlight; for at that period, I was romantic. Almost every one has a touch of that feeling at some time of his life—it comes as naturally as the whooping-cough or measles—but it soon wears away before the stern, grinding realities that press their hard surfaces against him at every step. Yes, I went out to walk in the moonlight, and absorbed in the contemplation of her serene highness—the queen of night—I ceased to take an interest in things mundane, and in consequence I suddenly found myself introduced to the charming inhabitants of a deep drain, nearly filled with muddy water. The bath ruined my clean shirt, my mother's morning work at the ironing-table, and left perceptible impressions on my buff vest and Websterian coat. I tried to convince myself that if I had been looking at things earthly, I should have seen the abominable obstacle to my further progress, but I know now, that this accident was only the first result of my bane. That night I awoke from sleep with a start. The old clock was striking the hour of midnight. The white moonlight filled the room with almost noonday radiance, and there by the window, horrible to perceive! was a tall figure, robed in white, with a fearful head, black as the pillars which support the dome of Erebus!

The cold sweat started out from every pore! I shivered like an autumn leaf, if not more so, and hid my face in the counterpane. By-and-by I ventured to look forth once more—still the gaunt presence kept its station, not a fold of its ghastly robe moving, not a feature of its black countenance relaxing! There it stood immovable, stern, and terrible as fate itself! I gave a desperate turn to my courage—it was screwed to the sticking point. I resolved on addressing my fearful guest. I had heard it remarked, that if, when visited by a ghost, you could speak to it and demand its errand, it would acknowledge the courtesy by unfolding its business and taking leave. I plucked off my nightcap, that all my senses might be acute; and unbuttoned my shirt-collar, for somehow I felt dreadfully the need of more air.

"Who, and what art thou, unnatural visitant?"

I used just the same tone of voice in making the address, that old Elder Blake generally employed in giving out the benediction.

There was no answer. The wind rustled the vines against the window, and bellowed fiercely down the chimney. Every separate hair on my scalp stood erect, like the quills of Shakspeare's porcupine.

"What dost thou here at this hour of the night? Why dost thou wander from thy grave, disturbing honest men?"

I say I was but fifteen years old then, but I had begun to scrape my upper lip with one of my father's cast-away razors, and consequently felt myself honestly entitled to the name of man.

Still, my visitor made no reply. O, how the cold shudders crept over me! I know exactly how the fever and ague affects one, though I have never been further west than Troy, in New York. I lay down again, and enveloped myself in the blanket. With the warmth of the bedding, I was reassured. I began to think that I was acting a very cowardly part. What would Angelica Brown say if she knew that I laid with my head covered up, afraid of somebody dressed in white? The thought gave me fresh courage, for Angelica was a particular flame of mine. What if I should arise and lay hands on the spectre, and force him to evacuate the premises, or explain his right to remain? Wouldn't it be a deed to relate to my children's grandchildren? Wouldn't an admiring posterity, years hence, point to my grave with pride, and say:

"There lies one who feared neither mortal nor immortal! The man who talked with ghosts—who communed with spectres—the renowned and brave Hoke Wilson, Esquire!"

Yes, I would perform the action (that is, if my courage did not ooze out in the showers of perspiration that ran down my body. I put one foot cautiously out of bed—then the other. Then I down with both together, and landed on the floor. Cautiously and breathlessly I crept towards the window; my heart was in my throat, and my eyes starting from their sockets! My knees knocked together like two dramsticks, animal heat had departed—I was cold as a block of ice! I neared the frightful apparition—I reached out my hand and grasped its garments! Humph! It was nothing more nor less than my white linen coat, which was spread over the back of the black stuffed rocking-chair!

So much for being near-sighted.

As time fled on, the accidents that I met with from being near-sighted were legion. I was continually stooping after imaginary pins and needles that proved nothing but straws. The figure of the carpet had a score of times deceived me into the belief that there was a buttercup littering the floor; I bumped my head against cupboard doors and clothes poles innumerable; I mistook the salt for sugar, and the boiled pork (which I abhorred) for the spotted cheese. At a neighbor's, I astonished the good woman by asking for a spoonful of blackberries and cream—it was in the month of January—and come to find out, I had mistaken a bowl of grey beans for the summer luxury of blackberries!

I could not tell the time of day by the town clock, if it had been to save the city; and I should not have recognized my own grandmother across the room. People with whom I was acquainted, began to call me haughty and "stuck up,"—I would meet them in the street, they said, and pass them by as though they had been so many lamp-posts! Good, well meaning souls; I did not recognize them from Adam! All this was, of course, very mortifying to me, and many a practical joke did I have played upon me by my pretended friends.

Near me lived the Widow Grey, a fine-looking, blooming woman of thirty-five. I was quite a frequent visitor at the widow's. My excuse for going there so often was that I was practising singing with the widow, who was a superior vocalist—but this was very far indeed from the truth. I went expressly to see the widow's daughter Mary! And this same Mary was as pretty a black-eyed lass of sixteen, as Hillville could boast. The widow was very young-looking herself, and persisted in keeping Mary in ridiculously short dresses, which gave the beaux of the village the idea that the mother considered herself still very marriageable.

One balmy October night (I was just nineteen then) I dropped in on the Greys, to assist the widow in singing a new adaptation of "Am I not fondly Thine Own?" The widow presided at the piano; we were alone in the parlor, Mary having gone out with some young friends. I stood behind the pianist, at her left hand—but the composition was entirely new to me, and at my distance from the music, I could not discern a single note. The base might commence with a crotchet, a quaver, or a semi-quaver—how was I to know? I did my best, however, keeping up with the accompaniment, and effectually drowning the widow's fine contralto voice.

"O mercy!" cried the fair one, dropping her fat, white hand on the keys with a hard clatter, "that note was staccato, and you sang it as though there was a hold over it!"

I tried again, but with no better success.

"Goodness, Heke!" screamed she, "what has got into you, I'd like to know? You call it sol, and it's do—low G—and a full swell! Don't you see?"

No, I certainly did not see, but I told her I did, and asked her pardon for my inattention. I will inform the reader, in confidence, that I had a great and over-mastering fear of having it known that I was near-sighted. I leaned down over the music, so low that my hair (it was worn in Byronic locks) touched her forehead. I rather think she liked that, for she stretched her long neck slightly upward, and lifted her eyes to my face. Well, how it happened I do not exactly know, but in some part of the music that required a little extra eyesight to dissect one quaver from another, I bent lower, and my lips came in direct contact with the widow's cheek! She quit playing in a moment, and shrieked out:

"Why, Mr. Wilson, how could you? Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

"I don't know as I am," said I, "I did the best I could with it. The base seems to be all mixed up with the tenor."

"Base, indeed!" ejaculated she. "Why, sir, do you pretend to deny that you kissed me?" Her face was as red as a full-blown peony, and her round blue eyes really expressed unlimited astonishment.

"Why, really, I—I—I beg your pardon!"

"No, I'll never pardon you, Hoky—no, never!" pouted she, half-covering her face with her hand, and inclining her head towards me.

"Madam, I never intended to kiss you! The touch was an accident!"

How I ever found courage to make the explanation, I do not know, but it was worth while to see Mrs. Grey when I had spoken. Never did I behold so irate a countenance on a female before!

"Hoke Wilson," said she, with terrible calmness, "it is a lie, sir! A false-faced bare hood! I mean a bare-faced falsehood! And I'll have you arrested for a breach of promise, see if I don't. You've visited here for more'n two years, and we'll see if a fellow's to be attentive to a lone widow for two whole years, and then have the effrontery to declare that he never intended to kiss her! Yes, we'll see! I'll go this instant to Squire Hill, and have the writ made out."

She stood up before me, pale, stern and resolute—a determined Nemesis. I have a holy horror of the law, and the bare mention of a writ made me shake with terror. Was there any harm in employing a little policy to assuage the widow's wounded pride, and save myself? No, no, I said, not the least.

"My dearest Mrs. Grey," I began, "I had never thought of kissing you, because it was something that I dared not do. Your well-known virtue and modesty would have deterred me. I should have lost your favor, without which I could not exist. And, my dear madam, cannot we settle this little matter without recourse to a third person? I should die of shame to hear your pure name brought into a disolute court!"

Well, I am not going to tell you all I said to the widow; but I gave her my handsome gold watch, and received her pardon. She hoped that our slight misunderstanding might not affect our friendship, and I said, "Assuredly not."

But do you think I ever ventured inside Sally Gray's door again? If you do, you are mistaken.

The time came when I left home for Boston, where I engaged in the practice of my profession; for I had studied medicine at Bowdoin. I soon obtained patronage, for I flatter myself that my skill was of no common order. But I made sad mistakes in the houses of my patients. I fell over poodle dogs; trod on cat's inviolable tails; knocked down diminutive flower-pots; entered wrong chambers, and fell down whole flights of stairs, by tripping my toes into loose pieces of carpeting.

In the street it was even worse. I knew nobody, of course; and I could not tell the Dock Square from the Hanover Street omnibus. No doubt my friends thought me very green, but I could not help it; near-sightedness, not verdancy, was my besetting curse.

I had a wonderful way of going into the wrong shops and places of business. I dumfounded more than one dainty milliner by entering her establishment and requesting to be shaved; and on one occasion I visited a stove warehouse to purchase a bonnet for my sister Georgia. The sign at the door deceived me. I thought it read—"Millinery and Bonnet Store,"—whereas, it read thus:—"Pottery and Iron Ware."

One day I concluded to visit home and surprise everybody. I had not had a letter from Hillville for a long ten weeks, and I thought it would be charming to drop in upon the dear ones at home, without warning. So I paid calls to all my patients, packed my valise, took a ticket for Hillville, and consigned myself to the rail-cars. Arrived at my destination, I walked briskly out towards my father's cottage in the suburbs. I reached the gate leading into the front yard, Georgia my sister was standing in the door. I cleared the fence with a bound, sprang up the walk, flung away my valise, clasped the dear girl in my arms, and nearly drowned her with kisses. Instead of returning my caresses, she kicked, struggled and screamed, "Murder! help!" at the top of her lungs. Her cries brought a tall, black-whiskered man from the back yard, armed with a hoe-handle, and of all the drubbings that ever one poor fellow received, I got the worst. I was black and blue for a fortnight. Soon as I could speak, I informed the black avenger that I was Mr. Wilson who had formerly resided there; that I was near-sighted, and that I had supposed the lady who was standing in the doorway at the time of my arrival, to be my sister Georgia. The gentleman looked puzzled for a moment, then he burst into a loud ha, ha, ha! It was no laughing matter for me, I assure you. I didn't understand what he could see so amusing.

"Ah, the Wilsons have removed from here to a stone front on Merton Street. I am Mr. Graham, the present proprietor of this cottage. The lady whom you mistook for your sister was my wife."

To do the Grahams justice, they tried hard to atone for the wrongs done me, and pressed me hard to stay all night. Mrs. Graham was a very pretty woman, but her husband had a jealous look, and I declined remaining. Mr. Graham then very kindly sent me over to my friends in his carriage.

Delighted with being at home, I entered without ringing, hurried through the hall and into the parlor, which was vacant. I seated myself in what I took for a light-cushioned arm-chair (it was early twilight), but, goodness, gracious! my seat sprang up with a scream, and fled from the room! It was a young lady dressed in buff muslin! Slightly out of temper with my continued ill-fortune, I groped my way through a dark passage, towards a light that streamed dimly from somewhere. The apartment that I entered was the kitchen, and intent on exploring it, and discovering its inhabitants, I did not observe a large tub of soft soap which obstructed my passage. Consequently I walked directly through it, or attempted to, but my foot caught in the handle, I tripped and fell my whole length on the hearth, where Sarah, our ancient domestic, was busied in stirring more soap. It was evidently soft-soap day at my father's. Sarah uttered the inimitable female scream, and fled from the house. I arose, and to vent my wrath some way, I kicked the unoffending skillet of soap into the fire!

Just then, Georgia appeared at the door. Dear girl—what a welcome I received! I was put into a hot bath, and then into bed, and nursed up with good eatables and drinkables to my heart's content. The next morning, I found on the stand by my bedside a pair of spectacles that made the world seem a new one to me. I have worn them ever since. The young lady in whose lap I had so unceremoniously quartered myself the previous evening, was Mabel Luther, Georgia's school-chum, and sometime—well, perhaps I shall be a married man yet, in spite of my infirmity.

TOBACCO USERS.

It has become very common to invest chewing tobacco and snuff in lead foil. Herr Hockel examined some snuff from a quantity, part of which had been used by a patient who was laboring under a severe attack of lead poisoning, and found that it contained two and a half per cent. of metallic lead. The tobacco near the corners of the package, being more perfectly enclosed by the foil, contained the most lead, which is decomposed by dampness, and remains in the tobacco or snuff in the form of carbonate of lead, which is the white lead paint of commerce, which inflicts such horrible sufferings on many of those whose business compels them to work in it. The slaves of the disgusting "weed" would do well to make a note of this, and either abandon the inexcusable filthiness, or avoid using any that is enveloped with lead foil.—Hints on Tobacco Using.

THE NIGHT ATTACK.

A MOUNTAIN STORY.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

A FEW weeks ago, while on a ramble in the Pyrenees, I came towards evening to a small auberge or inn. Hungry and tired, I was welcomed by a young woman, extremely good-looking. Goat's flesh, cheese and milk soon satisfied the cravings of nature, and I sat down to enjoy my pipe. My hostess seemed to be cheerful, but not gay. Her husband, she told me, was out on the hills, along with a lad who assisted him in the management of the little spot of ground attached to their residence. By the time the shades of evening had fallen in, I observed my hostess begin to show signs of impatience. Ever and anon she went to the door, looked around, returning each time with signs of anxiety visibly depicted in her countenance. At length I asked :

"Is there a storm at hand? or do you fear any harm?"

"O, sir!" she replied, "I am only a little distressed that Miguel—my husband—should be out so long. It will soon be dark."

"Is there any danger?—has the neighborhood a bad name?" I inquired.

"O, no, sir; the country is thought now to be quite safe, and I am perhaps foolish to be uneasy; but it was once so very unsafe, and we suffered so much from it in consequence, that I cannot rid myself of fear at times."

She bent down her head at times, as she spoke, and appeared to lose for a moment the sense of present weariness in the revived recollections of the past.

At this instant the door opened, and a tall, strapping, sunburnt fellow entered, whom I immediately conjectured to be the husband, from his being followed by a young peasant. My hostess had sprung to her feet, and I thought it augured well for her husband's marital tenderness, that he at once noticed her to have been discomposed, and exclaimed :

"What, Inez—at thy old terrors!"

Then noticing me for the first time in the growing dusk, he continued :

"And strangers with thee, too!"

He then saluted me civilly, and we were soon engaged in conversation.

I staid two days with Miguel and his wife, and became excellent friends with them. I found an opportunity to gratify my curiosity, by inquiring into the misfortunes which my hostess had alluded to as having arisen from the former insecurity of the country, and I heard the whole story from her. I now present it to the reader.

"But a few years ago," said Inez, which was my hostess's name, "my father was the tenant of this house where we now live. Here I was born, and here I had the misfortune to lose my mother in my youth; in short, all my days have been spent here. When I was about eighteen, I first became acquainted with Miguel, who had hired himself as conductor of a wagon that passed regularly by on this road from one part of the mountain to another. The wagon always stopped at night here as it passed, and Miguel and I began to love each other. Nor was it long before both of us were aware that this was the case. My father saw the state of our affections as well as we did, and he was not averse to our union, for he was growing old, and even at the best he always required a lad to assist him with the little farm, upon which our support depended much more than on the visit of travellers to the house. It was at length settled that Miguel and I should be married as soon as he had completed his term in his present situation.

"When this arrangement was made, Miguel had but three journeys backward and forward to perform. These were long journeys, to be sure, and what was worse, there were reports of recent robberies at no great distance, which rendered travelling dangerous. The first journey, however, was performed in safety. When Miguel came to us on his way over the mountains a second time, some circumstances took place which after events caused us to remember.

"A traveller had come to our house that day, before Miguel reached us with his wagon. That traveller was a dark, active looking man, dressed in the ordinary Spanish fashion, and seemingly in the prime of life. Before Miguel arrived, this stranger addressed himself to me in such a manner as was very disagreeable to me. I at first, indeed, paid little attention to his words, for my thoughts that day were occupied with another subject. When at length — encouraged, it may be, by my silence — he would have carried his freedoms further, I repelled him civilly, but firmly, and told him my affections and hand were engaged to another. The dark, malignant smile which came over his face as I told him this, gave new and unpleasing ideas of our guest. He did not alter his conduct, nor even when Miguel came did he desist from annoying me.

"This gave me much alarm, for I saw Miguel's eye darken as he observed his behaviour. Nor was my alarm groundless, for on the traveller's seizing and holding me by the arm as I passed him, Miguel sprang up and threw him violently to the further end of the room, where he fell heavily on the floor. In an instant the man was on his feet, had his long knife drawn from his belt, and seemed about to spring upon Miguel. But my father chanced to enter at that moment, and the traveller uttering a violent threat hastily left the house. Though he had spoken of resting all night he did not return.

"On being informed of what had passed, my father, who had been in a weak state of health for some time, said to Miguel :

" 'I grow weaker and weaker every day, my son. It is time that you were here to protect Inez, and myself also. Heaven help me! Had you not been accidentally here just now, we might have been exposed to any insult from such a rude visitor as this.'

"Miguel replied :

" 'You are right ; I ought to be here to guard those whose lives are so dear to me ; and I will be here without delay, if I can get a trusty substitute to perform the rest of the journey for me when I reach the town of Ai.'

"We talked long on these subjects before going to rest. Little rest, indeed, fell to my lot that night, for the dark looks and dagger of the man whom Miguel had made an enemy for my sake, came ever between me and slumber.

"In the morning Miguel departed with his wagon, under the promise to return soon, if it was in his power. I had, before, never felt so much anxiety at his departure, though when I told him so, he smiled at my fears on his account, and showed me his double-barrelled gun, which he called his sure protector. Nothing occurred for two days afterward, though during that interval many fears came over me relative to the possible return of the traveller.

"Our household at this time, it is to be understood, consisted of my father, a lad who assisted him out of doors, and myself. This lad went away first to rest, my father next, and I last. After they had both retired, on the second night from Miguel's departure, I closed the door, and went into my own little room to seek repose. But I had not yet undressed myself, when I heard a voice seemingly on the outside of the house. I listened, and heard it repeated, nearer at hand, as it appeared to me. Though much disturbed, I resolved to satisfy myself there was true cause for alarm before I called father. With this view, I took up my light, and went into the kitchen, when I saw a sight which rooted me to the spot. The under part of the window had been raised, and a man having got in with his feet foremost, was in the act of extricating his head and shoulders from the window. I screamed and fled in the direction of my father's sleeping-place, but before I had gone a few steps was in the grasp of the man who dragged me back to the kitchen.

"It was the traveller, who gave me a look of such triumphant malice, mingled with more hateful feelings, as made me shudder. Meanwhile, one man after another entered rapidly by the window, to the number of six, as it seemed to my confused senses. I then became insensible.

"How long I lay in this condition I cannot tell. On my recovery I found my father hanging over me in the state in which he had been dragged by the ruffians from his bed. The poor youth who lived with us was there in the same condition. Besides, the wretches had had time to discover and seize the little money and valuables—the fruit of my father's long toils.

"'Divide, divide!' said the chief of the robbers, 'for me, I will take nothing; this is my prize;' at the same time laying his hand on my shoulder.

"'O, Miguel! Miguel!' I thought, 'little knowest thou what Inez is now suffering!'

"Look at that open space, sir," said my hostess, at this part of her story, pointing at the same time to the end wall of her kitchen, where we were sitting. A portion of the space above the level of the side walls was open, being evidently an entrance into a hayloft that lay over the stable of the auberge, and which stable was continuous with the building, the whole being of one story.

"As I thought of Miguel at that awful moment," continued Inez, "my eyes were raised to that space, and there I beheld the head of Miguel. It struck me at first my excited fancy had conjured up an illusion, and I closed my eyes for a moment. Again I opened my eyes, and saw not only that Miguel was really there, but that he was about to attempt something for our delivery, for his gun was stretched out before him. He motioned to me with his hand, and I understood his intention and his purpose—his terrible, but necessary purpose. I bowed my head low, and in another second of time a sound as of thunder filled the room, followed by groans and curses. Another reverberation almost instantly followed, and amid the smoke that filled the room I saw nothing, though I heard my Miguel leap down into the chamber, shouting (doubtless, to deceive the robbers), 'Here, this way, my friends—down with the robbers!' I beheld some of the latter escaping from the room by the way they had entered, and all was ere long quiet.

"What a scene this place where we now sit, sir, presented, after that awful struggle. Two men, killed by one ball, lay prostrate on the floor, and another beside them mortally wounded. Miguel's first thought was to close the door more carefully for the night. He then informed us, that having procured a faithful substitute at the town of Ai, he had rapidly retraced his steps on foot, being apprehensive with fears for us.

"Next morning the bodies of the traveller and his comrades (the wounded one died after confessing that the former was captain of the gang) were removed. Miguel received the thanks of the whole country. My father lived long enough to see Miguel and me united. Thus you see, sir, that it is little wonder I should sometimes tremble, when Miguel is abroad at night on these lonely hills."

TOMATOES.

This is one of the most healthful as well as the most universally liked of all vegetables; its healthful qualities do not depend on the mode of preparation for the table; it may be eaten thrice a day, cold or hot, cooked or raw, alone, or with salt, pepper, or vinegar, or altogether, to a like advantage and to the utmost that can be taken with an appetite. Its healthful quality arises from its slight acidity, in this, making it as valuable perhaps as berries, cherries, currants and similar articles; it is also highly nutritious, but its chief virtue consists in its tendency to keep the bowels free, owing to the seeds which it contains, they acting as mechanical irritants to the inner coating of the bowels, causing them to throw out a larger amount of fluid matter than would otherwise have been done, to the effect of keeping the mucous surfaces lubricated, and securing a greater solubility of the intestinal contents, precisely on the principle that figs and white mustard seeds are so frequently efficient in removing constipation in certain forms of disease. The tomato season ends with the frost. If the vines are pulled up before the frost comes, and are hung up in a well-ventilated cellar with the tomatoes hanging to them, the "Love-Apple" will continue ripening until Christmas. The cellar should not be too dry nor too warm. The knowledge of this may be improved to great practical advantage for the benefit of many who are invalids and who are fond of the tomato.—Hull's Journal of Health.

Photography and Dentistry.

No art, excepting that of photography, has progressed and improved so rapidly as that of dentistry. Forty years ago it was not a distinct profession, for all doctors then officiated as tooth-pullers, with turnkey levers of the most rude description; and as for supplying the place of old teeth with new ones, it was never done at all. In 1820 there were only thirty practising dentists in the United States; in 1850 there were 2923; at present there are about 5000. The invention of artificial teeth has given a wonderful impetus to this most useful and beneficial art.

A BIT OF SENTIMENT.

BY MRS. E. B. EDSON.

In a little brown cottage just over the way,
Are two lovers coquetting the hours away;
O, beautiful pictures in love's fairy loom
Are woven in manhood's and maiden's young bloom.

The wind floated in with a gentle caress,
Just rustling the folds of her snowy dress,
And the sun, darling fellow, was certainly bold,
To weave in her tresses such pictures of gold!

And I know quite as well as if I had heard,
That he whispered just now some passionate word,
For the rosy tide ripples, and ebbs, and flows,
O'er her bosom, more fair than the drifted snows.

This bewitching and beautiful daughter of Eve
Ne'er meant such a thing—of course, I believe;
But it looked like a challenge, I'm bound to confess,
When she kissed her pet dove with such loving caress.

I don't think him, do you? so deserving of blame,
For trying to do very much the same;
Sure the veriest cynic, or anchorite cold,
Would yield to her roces and tresses of gold

So it was not so strange that the passion of youth
Caught a flame from the altar of beauty and truth;
For the beauty of Eden, the freshness of May,
Are paled by the brightness of love's summer day.

The Romance of Hope Weston's Life.

BY GEORGIN C. LYMAN.

"My dear girl," said my cousin Hope, bringing her quiet, cheerful face into my room one day, "how forlorn you look! What is the matter?"

"O, nothing more serious than that I have a story to write, and send out by this evening's mail, and have n't the first idea to begin on," I replied, drearily.

"Well, poor child, don't look so doleful about it. Let me see what I can do to help you. How would 'The Romance of Hope Weston's Life' do for a title?"

"Very well."

"Then, now for the story. Listen.

"I was just sixteen—a petted, delicately-reared young girl, when my mother died. I left my native village, and went alone to New York to earn my living. Such a desolate young heart as I carried into the great city! But I could not stop to weep. I must work hard and steadily, and a long time must elapse before either hands or brain could rest. The large sum of money needed to pay the expenses of my mother's long illness must be earned, and a respectable living procured for myself, meanwhile. This I calculated would take me all summer, perhaps through the fall, and then, once clear of debt, I could commence the long-cherished plan of educating myself for a writer. I was sure that this was my true vocation—the one for which I was best fitted by nature, and should succeed in. There was so much in my heart which could not be told in any other way—so much that I could say to none but the great world, and would never have uttered in confidence to the dearest friend living. No false ambition for fame, or adventitious spirit, led me to this path. I believed fictitious writing to be useful, and as necessary a part of literature as flowers are of the vegetable creation, and was influenced only by sincere and earnest promptings to obey nature, and do what little good I might. And so I wrote; at first very simply and briefly, but receiving encouragement, I ventured a step further, and in a short time becoming a regular correspondent to several weekly journals, received suitable remuneration for my articles. Until my mother's death, I had written only when in the mood for writing, carrying the fresh enthusiasm of the hour into my productions; and when I planned to make authorship my means of support I did not realize how necessary this natural impulse was to my success. Once the thought occurred to me, but I said to myself, crushing down a sigh:

"'Where there is a will there is a way;' I must not fail."

"When I stepped upon the crowded platform of the depot at New York, I stood for a moment bewildered by the rush and tumult. Some one touched my arm.

"'Carriage, ma'am?'"

"'Yes!' I replied, turning to a hack-driver with a feeling of relief, and he led the way to the street. I had one acquaintance in the city, a gentleman who had once resided in my native place, and to whom I went for instructions where to find a boarding-place. He directed me to a large brick house, on the corner of a street, and facing a common, green and shady with trees. The mistress of the establishment, a spare, black-eyed little woman, with movements so sudden and quick that she made me constantly apprehensive and nervous, received me with voluble cordiality, after reading the note of introduction which I had brought from my friend, and went chatting up the stairs, requesting me to follow.

"'You had better look at the unoccupied rooms now, and select one, Miss Weston,' she said. 'What kind of a room do you want?'"

" 'I should like two apartments,' I replied ; 'one to be used as a sitting-room, the other as a bedroom.'

"She paused in apparent surprise, and looked me over from head to foot.

" 'Two rooms?' she repeated. 'My lady boarders seldom require but one.'

" 'Yes, ma'am ; I require two.'

"Perhaps I spoke a little shortly, for I was annoyed by her manner, which seemed to imply a doubt of my being able to pay for an extra apartment.

" 'You are a teacher?' she asked, after a pause, as we walked along the neatly carpeted halls.

" 'No, ma'am.'

" 'Ah, a pupil. I have several of the high school scholars boarding with me at present.'

" 'I do not attend school,' was my brief reply.

"It it had been necessary for her to know what my occupation was, I should have told her ; but coming to her as I did, with a note of recommendation from a respectable person, her motive in wishing to know my business was no higher one than a vulgar, personal curiosity, and I was not in the mood to satisfy it. She pursued her inquiries no further, after my last unsatisfactory answer, and when I had selected my rooms, and paid for them in advance, according to the rule of the house, she left me.

"The apartments were of good size and neatly furnished, and having arranged my clothes in the wardrobe, unpacked my books, and hung the few choice pictures I possessed upon the walls, the place put on quite a home look.

"The next morning I went to work. There were some drawbacks—the constant noise in the streets, so different from the dreamy stillness of the country, annoyed me very much—but I met with as good success at the beginning as I had dared to hope. But after a while I found that the confinement was wearing upon me ; that the face which looked out from the carved frame of my bedroom mirror, grew daily paler and thinner. I began to be anxious about my health. I had never thought of that failing me. The long days of loneliness wore upon my spirits, and I grew nervous and unhappy ; for I had no companions. There was no congeniality between me and the gay, high-spirited, showily-dressed girls, whom I met at table twice a day, and I never spoke to them. There was but one of their number whom I even knew by name. She was a tall, dark, handsome girl, the niece of my boarding-mistress, and they called her Kate De Kalb. Her room was opposite mine, and she sat next me during meals, and though I liked her even less than I did many of the others, we sometimes exchanged a few words. The gentlemen boarders I seldom saw, for they took their meals half an hour earlier in the morning, and an hour later at noon and night than I did.

"One afternoon, in coming from my publisher's office, I was caught in a shower, and when I reached the house went round to the basement door, fearing that my wet boots would make marks upon the neat carpet of the front hall. But as soon as I entered the yard, I stopped involuntarily. Such a pretty, laughable sight ! A little child stood upon the steps of the entrance, his flushed cheeks dashed with water, his golden hair hanging drenched over his shoulders, his pretty head thrown back, and his rosy mouth stretched to its widest extent to catch the rain-drops. I could not help laughing aloud.

"The little one started, cast a quick glance over his shoulder at the door, and then stood looking shyly at me as I advanced.

" 'You little Cupid, what is your name ?' I asked, stooping to kiss him.

" 'Archie Winchester,' he replied, in his pretty, baby English.

" 'What will your mother say ?—see how wet you are,' I said.

" 'She wont say anything, 'cos she's dead, but Sallie 'll shake me,' he replied, gravely.

"I was amused by his coolness.

" 'Did n't you know that you would get punished for coming out ?' I asked.

" 'Yes ; but I'd rather play out in the rain and take a shaking, than to stay in the house and not,' he answered, and, laughing, I led my dripping little philosopher into the kitchen.

"A stout, red-armed Irish girl, sitting by the fire, sprang up as we entered, and, catching the child by the arm, shook him most vigorously.

" 'Ye little haythen !' she cried, in her strong brogue, 'you'll be the death of me yit. Faix, but it's enough to put patience out uv a saint. Lak at him, Ann ; dthripping from head to foot !'

"A girl engaged in ironing at a table looked around, and burst into a loud laugh.

" 'Och ! you'll have to sthrip him,' she cried.

"And stripped the child was in a twinkling, and left standing before the fire in his little shirt. He had not uttered a cry or a word.

"When the girl had procured dry clothes, arrayed him in them, and made his beautiful hair into glossy curls by winding it about her fingers, she thumped him into a chair, with the command to stay there until supper time !

"The little fellow sat quietly enough until her back was turned towards him, and then he slid down and stole over to me as I sat by the stove, drying my feet, for there was no fire in my room.

"Take me," he whispered, reaching up his arms, and laughing till his cheeks were dimpled all over; and after a moment's hesitation, I took him upon my lap. He did not talk much, only answered my questions in his quiet, old-fashioned way, and lay still in my arms, with his golden head against my shoulder.

"After a while I told him I must go to my room, and attempted to put him down.

"Let me go with you; please let me go," he pleaded, clinging to my dress with his little, fair hands. 'I will be good.'

"A little timidly, for I did not know how my request would be received, I went over to where the child's nurse stood at a window.

"I should like to have your charge come to my room with me a little while, if you are willing," I said.

"Certainly, mum;" and stooping down to the child, she jerked his clothes in order with a force that spoke well for the strength of the thread with which they were made.

"Don't be a throuble to the leddy, Archie!" she called after him.

"I was delighted with my success, and bore the child off to my lonely rooms in triumph. Little sunbeam! how he brightened the place with his sweet face and golden hair! I rocked him in my arms, and told him stories, and sung him songs, till the tea bell rang, when Sallie came for him.

"I don't want my supper, and I want you to put me to bed!" he cried, clinging to my neck, and resisting her attempts to take him. I interposed, expressing my willingness to undress the child, and, apparently willing to be rid of the trouble, the girl brought me his night-clothes, and left him to my care.

"When robed in his little white night-dress, I carried him to a room at the further end of the hall, which he said was his chamber. It was a tasteful, airy, spacious apartment, with graceful furniture of a light color, a delicately tinted carpet, and white window shades, with drab tassels.

"Do you sleep here alone, Archie?" I asked.

"No," he replied. 'Papa sleeps with me. See, here is his other room!' and he bounded forward, and flung open a door.

"I held my breath in involuntary admiration. Never in my life, I thought, had I seen anything half so beautiful as the mossy carpet, with its velvet roses and lilies, which covered the floor of that wonderful room. The elegant sofas, luxurious arm-chairs, and mahogany book-case, with its long doers of gleaming plate-glass, were miracles of beauty to me. A dainty lounge covered with violet velvet, was drawn up beside a marble-topped table, upon which was a cigar-case, an open book, and a showy vase of Parian marble, holding a spray of crimson roses. The walls were hung with delicate engravings of lovely female faces, and fine oil-paintings, full of mellow lights and shadows, and about the room were niches artificially made for choice cream-white statuary. My first glance was one of delight, my next of apprehension. But the apartment was unoccupied. Over the arm of a sofa I noticed a gentleman's dressing-gown, and upon a gracefully carved side table was a stained goblet of water, a kid glove, and a withered water lily, but the owner of that regal room was not present. I lingered a moment longer, and then drew back.

"Come, Archie—come out and shut the door. We must not go in," I said to the child, who was running back and forth over the carpet with his little bare feet. He obeyed me instantly. I taught him a little prayer, and kissing him good night, entered my own rooms with the happiest heart I had carried for weeks.

"After that, it became a regular practice for me to put the little one to bed at night. I was a little timid at first about entering the child's room so freely, fearing that I might meet his father, but I never did. Sometimes my heart would bound suddenly when I opened the door of the chamber, and heard a slight noise which seemed to come from the adjoining apartment; but long as I might listen, nothing more could I hear, and so I would enter. But I was apprehensive and watchful all the time Archie knelt at my knee, and when his little prayer was said, I would lift him into the bed, and hurry away.

The summer days grew long and hot, and I became weary, mentally and physically. I could not write, try as I might, I was so tired and heart-sore. My publishers complained that my stories lacked interest, and lessened the remuneration. For a while I was roused by desperation, and wrote, but with beating temples and hot, unsteady hands. Then again I sank back into the old nerveless, despairing state. I could not work at anything else, or read, or weep—only bow my pale face upon my hands, and repeat again and again, 'What can I do?'

"One sultry, stifling afternoon, I lay stretched upon my bed, trying to sleep, that I might ease the throbbing pain in my head. I had just fallen into a light, uneasy slumber, when a light noise in the adjoining apartment aroused me, and thinking Archie was there, for he stole away to me whenever he could, I called. There was no reply, only a quick step, and then I heard the door shut. I arose and went out. O, life and hope! how my heart bounded as my eyes rested on the table. A whole summer's sweetness and sunshine seemed nestled in the deep, fragrant hearts of the flowers, which some one had left there. There were golden-hearted lilies, rich, wine-hued English pansies, blood-red and milk-white roses, carnations, passion-flowers, azure-tinted hyacinths, and creamy japonicas. With a satisfied heart, I knelt down beside them, and pressed my lips to them. I clasped my reverent hands over them, and wept all the darkness and bitterness out of my soul. They were what I needed. I wanted nothing more. I could work then. Their fragrant breath had in it the old dreamy fancies. They thronged into my brain, and made my heart fresh and tender. Yes, I could write, and as in the old time.

"It is strange, but I gave but one thought to the donor of the gift. I did not care from whence they came; the thought that they were mine crowded down as insignificant every other idea. I was satisfied, blest, calmly happy. The little sketch that I wrote the next day, sitting by the table, with the sweet eyes of the blossoms watching me, received extraordinary praise. Alas, on the third day my treasures began to droop their dear heads, as if their mission was ended, and I wept and prayed that they might not leave me. But I did not see them die. They were gone one night when I returned to my room after tea, and others as fair and sweet and fresher, occupied their place. And in turn others succeeded them, coming as silently and strangely as their predecessors. At last my curiosity was aroused, but I racked my brain uselessly to untangle the mystery. I was forced to be satisfied, and rest content in my bewilderment.

"One evening when the summer was almost through—indeed, I think it was the first of September—I went down to tea with one of the spicy tube roses upon my bosom. Its rich fragrance attracted the attention of Kate De Kalb, and as we passed into the hall together after the meal was finished, she said, smiling, 'A love gift, Miss Weston?'

"'I hope so,' I replied, not heeding what I was saying, as I stooped to lift Archie in my arms, as he sprang towards me. There was a gentleman at the foot of the stairs—I did not at first notice whom—and as I was about to pass up with the child, he held out his arm to him. I glanced at him, saw that it was Mr. Winchester (I knew him by sight), and reached Archie towards him. The little fellow put out his right arm to his father, while he clung with the other to my neck, and then, as the gentleman bent forward, and before I realized what he was about, he drew us both towards him. Mr. Winchester's bearded lips touched my cheek; could I think it accidental? I shook myself clear of the child's embrace, and sprang up the stairs, giving but one glance back. But that look showed me two pairs of eyes following my motions. One was clear, brown, and smiling, the other, glittering, black, and evil.

"I had it in my mind to reprove my pet for what he had done, when he came to be undressed, but the look on his face, when he came to me an hour later, silenced me. The warm flush had gone from his cheeks, and his violet eyes were heavy and languid. He pressed his little hands against his forehead, and said it ached.

"I bathed his head with cold water, rocked him in my arms till it was dark, and then, still wide awake, he asked me to take him to bed. I hesitated.

"'Where is your father, Archie?'

"'Gone down town,' he replied.

"'Did you see him go?'

"'Yes,' he said.

"I carried him to his room and laid him on the bed, but he clung to me with his little, hot hands.

"'Please stay a little while,' he pleaded.

"Thinking that he would soon fall asleep, I sat down upon the side of the bedstead, and rested my face upon the pillow beside him. He put his arms about my neck, and lay quiet. I did not know that I was drowsy, but my position was an easy one. I was weary with working all day, and before I realized that I was falling asleep, I was insensible.

"I was suddenly awakened by the sound of the city clocks striking ten, and at the same moment I heard a door open, and a light flashed upon my bewildered eyes. I leaped to my feet, and stood a moment confounded. Then murmuring something, I did not know what, I sprang past Mr. Winchester, and rushed into the hall. In the darkness I ran against some one who seemed to be standing there, but too confused and frightened to care who it was, I did not pause until I had locked myself in my own room. I was almost wild for a time with shame, fear, and apprehension, and had not closed my eyes in sleep when the morning came. I pleaded illness as an excuse for my non-attendance at breakfast, and, indeed, I was almost blind with a terrible headache. I was so confused that I could not determine what course I ought to pursue, and the more I thought of the matter, the more I was troubled. I fretted myself almost into a fever before night, and went down to tea, sick and loathing food, though I forced myself to eat, fearing that my manner would attract attention. As I rose from the table, Kate De Kalb made some trifling allusion to roses, and fixed her sneering eyes on my face. I could see no hidden meaning in her words, but the peculiar look she gave me haunted me long after I returned to my room. It was scarcely dark, when a servant came and informed me that Mrs. Maynard, my boarding-mistress, wished to see me in the back parlor. With my face flushed and my heart beating heavily, I obeyed the summons. I hardly knew what I dreaded, though I was shivering with fear as I entered the room. My anxiety and unhappiness had been caused by the fear of what Mr. Winchester would think of me. I had never once thought of his betraying me, but as I met the severe expression of Mrs. Maynard's face, and the sneering smile of her niece, I apprehended with a sudden faintness what was coming.

"Miss Weston," began Mrs. Maynard, motioning me to a seat, "I have requested this interview for the purpose of advising you never to attempt again to impose upon persons of respectability by assuming a character which is not your own, for your success will be but of short duration. You have played your part with good success until now, but after a young lady is seen coming from a gentleman's room at ten o'clock at night!"

"Mrs. Maynard!" I gasped, my lips white and stiff.

"O, don't attempt that," interrupted Kate De Kalb, with a short, scornful laugh, "for it wont avail you in the least. Miss Weston, you are a shameless creature. I saw you come from Mr. Winchester's room last night. For a long time I have noticed your manoeuvres to attract his attention, but I never suspected that you were so degraded. I have thought you artful and unwomanly, but I have always given you credit for respectability. Mr. Winches—"

"The folding-doors behind her were thrown back suddenly, and the owner of the name which was upon her lips strode into the room. With his dark eyes flashing, he faced her.

"Hush, you evil-minded, heartless woman!" he exclaimed, and then turned to her aunt:

"Mrs. Maynard, you know me to be a man of good character, and will not doubt my word, when I tell you that the motive which induced Miss Weston to visit my chamber last night, was one which an angel might be proud of. When I assure you of this, it will be unnecessary for the young lady to say more unless she wishes to do so."

"The room was as still as death as his clear, rich voice ceased. Mrs. Maynard looked bewildered, her niece became crimson. I rose from my chair, and turned towards the door.

"Miss Weston—" began the confused lady of the house, but I hurried from the sound of her voice, as if it had been a pestilence. In the second hall I paused at my door. There was a step behind me. I tried to look up at Mr. Winchester and speak, but my lids would not be raised, my lips were rigid. I could only hold out my hand. He took it in both his warm, strong palms.

"He did not speak for a moment, but searched my face with his deep eyes silently. Then he said, 'Good night, dear child!' gently, and turned away. He took but three steps, and immediately retraced them.

"Hope," he said—how well I liked my name when he pronounced it—"you are like a timid, defenceless little dove, in a nest of serpents. Will you let me shield you, and take care of you through life? For I love you, dear one, best of all the world. See, I can hold you so that harm can never reach you. Look up; answer me."

"I did look up, but did not speak, and he was satisfied. And he is the dearest husband in the world!"

No need to have told me that, dear little woman. She jumped up from the low seat at my feet, laughing and blushing as if she were ashamed of having made the assertion, and ran away from my voice, as I sang, "And they lived in peace," etc., leaving me to write her story.

PRIDE AND EXCLUSIVENESS.

It is reported of the proud Duke of Somerset that he never stooped to speak to a servant, but signified his wants by signs. His children were not allowed to sit in his presence. In his afternoon nap, one of his daughters was required to stand by him as he slept. Lady Charlotte Seymour, having once, when very tired, violated this etiquette, he left her in his will £20,000 less than her sister. His second wife once gave him an affectionate and familiar tap with her fan. "My first duchess," said the august noble, drawing himself haughtily up, "was a Percy, and she never would have taken such a liberty."—Anecdotes of English Aristocracy.

A CONSTANT SOLDIER.

Ay, still he loves
The lion-tressed Bellona, like a bride;
Wooes her with blows; and when his limbs all sweat
With struggling through the iron ranks of war,
Down doth he tumble on the tired ground,
Wipes his red forehead; cries, "How brave is this!"
And dreams all night of bloody victory!

O, FOR A FAITHFUL HEART!

BY WILLIAM WAIT.

O, for a heart on which to lean,
When weak, and worn, and faint;
O, for a breast on which to weep,
When sad, without restraint;
O, for a gentle hand to rest
Mid my neglected hair,
To soothe my brow, and leave the touch
Of loving comfort there!

O, for a voice to whisper faith,
In accents soft and low;
To chase with kindness grief away—
Dispel the shades of woe!
To hush my doubts to sweetest rest,
And calm my anguished fears;
To stay my sighs, and dry with love
My often falling tears!

O, for a loving eye,
Beaming with kindly light,
Irradiant with a flood of peace,
With tender feelings bright!
Methinks, beneath its soothing ray
Sweet happiness would come,
And heavenly sunshine rest upon
My lone and dreary home!

O, for one hour of rest,
To throw all care away,
And feel that not a duty calls
The whole long, tranquil day;
To lean in sweet oblivion
On some protecting breast,
And be in love's dear presence
For one short hour blest!

Why should I murmur thus?
God's ways are always right!
Against Him I would not rebel,
Though wrapt in blackest night.
Aid me, thou great Jehovah!
Let these poisonous thoughts depart;
Help me to labor on through life
With an unrepining heart!

THE GRAVE OF ONONTAWA.

BY GIACOMO S. CAMPANA.

To the lover of the picturesque, the mountain ranges of Western Virginia are one vast, unworked mine of beauty. In saying Western Virginia, I adopt the customary phraseology, though a large part of the mountains of Virginia are near the centre of the State. For a long time this region has been a terra incognita for the people of the United States in general; but of late years the mineral springs, which are nowhere more numerous, have drawn attention somewhat to the unrivalled scenery.

My daughters had long been urging me to make a summer tour through this portion of our native State, and a few years ago I consented, and spent the whole of the warm season among the watering places, and the magnificent mountain scenery among which they lie.

As I am always reluctant to leave home, however, the thing would hardly have been done, if it had not been for the sake of our governess, the teacher and friend of my motherless girls. Always pale and languid, she had for a year past shown symptoms of declining health calculated to give us much uneasiness; and it was the hope of benefiting her, more than anything else, which eventually sent me forth among the mountains.

Mrs. Andrews had been with us several years, and was highly esteemed by us all. Her own daughter, now about sixteen years of age, was one of our party, and her ever ready laugh and exuberant joyousness were in striking contrast to the patient, unobtrusive, but painfully apparent melancholy of the mother. We knew little or nothing of the cause of this. Indeed, we were almost entirely ignorant of her history, and we had no disposition to pry into that about which she had evidently no wish to be communicative. The daughter was apparently no better informed on the subject than ourselves.

We had reached the extreme limit prescribed for our journey, and were now on our way home again. Some sixteen or eighteen miles to one side of our intended route, lay an extremely picturesque valley, of which we had heard, but which we had no intention at that time, of visiting, as it was an isolated, secluded, out-of-the-way spot, and rather difficult of access.

But, very much to our surprise, Mrs. Andrews expressed a wish to see the valley, and I at once resolved to give her an opportunity of doing so. It was so very rare a thing for her to express a wish of any sort, that no one of us would have hesitated a moment about doing all that was possible with the view of gratifying her, and I least of all.

We were well rewarded for the trouble it cost us to reach the mountain-girt solitude, both by the remarkable quality of the scenery, and by the evident interest taken in it by our invalid friend. She was so much absorbed and excited, indeed, that I sometimes felt afraid that ill consequences might follow.

One evening, in particular, Mrs. Andrews's emotion overcame her so that we were forced to stop and rest sooner than we had intended. The nearest house, indeed the only one for a great distance, was a cottage, all embowered in verdure, and built upon a site the most beautiful I had ever beheld. The place was now in the hands of a rude, rustic tenant; but it was easy to see that the builder and former inhabitant must have been a person of no ordinary degree of taste and refinement. The man in charge had never seen the proprietor, who had not visited that part of the country, he said, for a number of years, and left everything in the hands of a lawyer, who lived in Lynchburg.

We spent the night with the farmer, and listened to his account of some of the marvellous hunting exploits performed in that Alpine locality. He also told us of a sort of wild man, who had been seen among the mountains, by himself and others; but where he lived, or who he was, or what he did, or where he came from, nobody could tell. Whether he was a real live man or not, was also a matter of doubt, some rather believing him to be a "sperrit."

The next morning we started, on horseback, up the neighboring mountain, which rose just back of our host's orchard. Our ultimate destination was a cave, where a gigantic skeleton had been found by the first settlers of the valley. These bones, and the place of their discovery, were regarded with superstitious veneration by the aborigines, who looked upon them as the remains of a sort of traditional demi-god, whom they called Onontawa.

The cave itself was known to them as the "Grave of Onontawa," and the superstitious feeling with which it was regarded had been in a good degree communicated to the white settlers, very few of whom would on any account go near it; this same feeling had been handed down from generation to generation, till the present day.

For this reason we found it impossible to get any one to go to the cave with us. The farmer's eldest son, however, accompanied us as far as the route was accessible on horseback, and undertook the care of the animals till our return. Though we started soon after sunrise, it was nearly ten o'clock before we reached this spot, so frequently were we lured from the path by the magnificent scenery which everywhere surrounded us. The distance, in a direct line, was but trifling.

We found the Grave of Onontawa to be a cave with a high but narrow entrance, inconsiderable in point of size, and with nothing remarkable about it, that we could discover. There were still a few bones of wild animals there, but no human ones. Our young people were soon satisfied with their explorations, and began to look for berries, on the outside, leaving Mrs. Andrews and myself to rest quietly within the cavern.

Seeing some rather rare minerals just at the entrance, I went to look at them, and spent some time in getting a few small specimens. When I had secured them, I returned to the place where I had left Mrs. Andrews, but, to my extreme astonishment I found her no longer there.

I called her, but she did not answer; I searched in every nook and corner, but she was nowhere to be seen. She could not possibly have left the cave without my noticing it, for at the point where I had been standing, her dress must have touched me as she passed out.

Surprise now began to be mingled with alarm. The thing was so utterly strange and unaccountable, that my mind would, in spite of me, revert to the evil reputation of the place, while a feeling very much akin to superstitious awe stole over me, the existence of which I was hardly willing to acknowledge, even to myself. The cave was not large, and it was tolerably well lighted, the entrance, as I have stated, being quite a lofty one.

After the lapse of three or four minutes, I instituted a second search, going carefully round the whole place; but my success was no better than before. There were of course cracks, and crevices, and inequalities in the walls, and pretty deep fissure in the rocks in some places; but no cavity, that I could find, where anything larger than a cat could have lain concealed. But even if there had been such a place, why should Mrs. Andrews act in such an extraordinary manner as to conceal herself there? Why indeed? It was a mystery which only grew darker the more I endeavored to throw light upon it.

I dreaded every moment to hear the merry voices of the girls returning to seek us. What could I say to that sweet child when she should come to me, all trembling with apprehension, and ask me where her mother was? The very idea was torture to me. I went to the mouth of the cave, to see if they were near, and was gratified to perceive that they were all out of sight, and apparently very busy enjoying themselves. I could just hear their voices through the bushes.

Entering the cave again, I had not taken more than half a dozen steps, when I saw Mrs. Andrews, reclining on a heap of leaves, in the same attitude, and on the very same spot in which I had left her when I went to look at the minerals near the entrance!

"O, let us go back," said she, beseechingly, as soon as she saw me.

She looked so feeble, wan, and wretched, that

I controlled my curiosity, and asked her if she would not rest awhile first.

"O, no! Do let us leave this place without delay—this very instant." And as she said this she gazed wildly about her, as if she was afraid of seeing some horrible spectre, if she should remain there.

I gave her my arm, without any further remark, and we left the cave together. A few yards only from its mouth, we came suddenly upon a stranger, who had just stepped out of a dense pine thicket. He was a tall person, with the air and look of a gentleman, pale, and thin to emaciation, with dark hair, and a long black beard considerably streaked with gray.

The moment he saw Mrs. Andrews, he started back, as if he had been stabbed, and would probably have fallen to the ground if a tree against which he staggered had not sustained him. In a few seconds, however, he recovered, and immediately darted into the cavern. At the same instant, Mrs. Andrews bore so heavily upon my arm that all my attention was transferred to her. She had fainted outright.

Half believing that there was, after all, some demoniacal influence about the Grave of Onontawa, I allowed the lady to slip gently down upon the grass, and applied myself to the task of restoring her to consciousness. After a while, she opened her eyes, shuddered, gazed wildly around her, and then begged that I would take her away. The girls were already calling to us from the spot where we left the horses. With some difficulty she managed to get thither, to mount, and ride back to the cottage without particularly attracting the attention of the others. When she reached it, however, she was forced to retire to her bed immediately.

As the lady could not then be questioned, I determined to seek the individual who had produced such an extraordinary impression upon her. After a frugal dinner, I took the farmer's rifle, and other shooting implements, and hastened back to the cave, thinking it probable that I should find him there or somewhere thereabouts.

Sure enough, just as I emerged from the bushes, near the mouth of the cave, I saw him, within a few yards of it. His back was towards me. He was evidently making for the cave, and in half a minute he entered it. I pushed on after him, and in two minutes, perhaps, was within the entrance, and looking about eagerly for the stranger. But, like Mrs. Andrews, he had vanished!

"Come, come," said I to myself, "people don't carry the fern-seed of invisibility in this age or country; I must find the secret way out of this place. If others can get out I can."

It is possible I might have done so if I had tried long enough and hard enough; but half an hour more of diligent scrutiny proving fruitless, I gave up the search. I found everything precisely as it was when I made my examination in the morning. There was surely no visible outlet, and no large hole, anywhere, except an excavation in the floor, close to the southern wall, which I had already examined. It was several feet deep, but upon trying it with a ramrod, I found that it did not extend back, under the wall, more than two or three feet. The means of egress, if it existed, must be a secret one. How then did Mrs. Andrews find it out?

I stood for some time, thinking the thing over, and while I was thus occupied, to my excessive astonishment, the man I was looking for stepped out of that very hole which I had just found to be only about three feet and a half deep, and which extended into the wall certainly less than three feet. He seemed a little surprised to see me there, but he advanced without hesitation, and the light from the entrance fell full upon his face as he did so. It was a face painful to behold. He seemed hardly more than forty years of age, but sickness, or sorrow, or some such thing, had ploughed his wan visage with the furrows of three-score, and stamped upon it an expression which might well have been translated by the famous inscription in Dante's Inferno, "No hope enters here."

"Sir," said I, "I trust you will attribute to something more important than mere curiosity the motive which induces me to beg of you some explanation of the extraordinary influence produced by your presence upon Mrs. Andrews, who is a valued member of my family."

"Mrs. who?"

"Mrs. Andrews."

"A member of your family, is she?"

"Yes."

"Then I advise you to get rid of her as soon as possible." And with these words he turned quickly upon his heel, and prepared to leave the cavern.

"But you have not answered my question," said I, interrupting him.

After gazing at me a minute or two, he said, "Why do you not ask her for an explanation?"

"Because she is not in a condition to give it. She was hardly able to ride to a place of shelter, and is now in bed."

"Humph! May I ask what position Mrs.—A.—Mrs. Andrews occupies in your family?"

"She is my daughters' governess."

"Then, sir, content yourself with the solemn assurance of a truthful man, that she is, in a moral point of view, unfit for such a position; and do you get rid of her as soon as you can."

"Pardon me, sir, but you have not answered my question, and I think it is your duty to give me further information."

"You will not dismiss your governess without proof of what I have asserted?"

"Certainly not; nor do I think that anything you are likely to tell me will induce me to take such a step."

The stranger appeared to reflect for a short time, and then said:

"I will tell you what I know of that woman's history, and then you will do as you please. Follow me."

As he said this he advanced to the wall of the cavern farthest from the entrance, and stepping into the hole from which he had emerged, almost immediately disappeared. I followed his example, and when I had stooped down, I found that I could pass under the rocky wall, where it came down nearly to the level of the floor. The excavation which I have described gave me room to stoop under it, and pressing close against the rock where I had touched it with the ramrod, I found that there was room enough for me to rise into an upright posture, and stand between that rock and the wall, in such a position that an observer in the cavern would have been able to see my legs only.

By putting out my hands, I now found that there was room to move only in one direction—the right. Just as I ascertained this fact, my predecessor took hold of my hand, and led me away in that direction, telling me at the same time to look well to my feet. The caution was not unnecessary, for the very first step I took was an ascent of eight or ten inches. A few more steps, still ascending to the right, brought us to a level place, where the two rocks, between which we were, retreated from each other, so as to give us plenty of room in every direction. There was a dim light, too, coming from a fissure far above our heads.

From this point the passage turned, so as to lead us nearly at right angles to our former course, and away from the cave we had just left. This passage was perhaps fifteen or twenty feet in length, and terminated in another excavation made by nature's hands, which was much larger than the Grave of Onontawa. No hall or temple of human construction would bear comparison for a moment with this splendid apartment.

The ceiling was of immense height, reaching to the very summit of one of the highest peaks of the mountains, and from a great rift in the vast rocky dome sending down a flood of light upon a mazy wilderness of stalactites, assuming thousands of shapes of strange, fantastic beauty. I had but little time, however, to note the wonders of the place, for my conductor hurried me on, through this Aladdin's palace, then into another passage, and by this time to a third cave, smaller than either of the others, but perfectly dry, and fitted up with furniture, which must all have been introduced piecemeal, through the narrow passage, but which was nevertheless convenient, elegant, and almost luxurious. And here also was a skylight, formed by the same fissure, running across the rocky pinnacle, at a point where human foot had never trodden.

Without giving me time even to wonder at the marvels which I was encountering at every step, the stranger motioned me to a seat, threw himself into another, and commenced the following narrative of a portion of his own history:—

—The events which I am about to relate have never spoken of to any one—never thought of doing so. But it seems necessary that I should make an exception in your case. I will be as brief as possible.

I am a native of Virginia, but not of this part of the State. I was born in the tide-water section, the sole offspring of a wealthy planter. Both of my parents died before I was old enough to know them, and having no near relatives in the United States, I was brought up by a guardian, who gave himself very little trouble about me. My property was well managed, but my moral and mental culture was left pretty much to take care of itself.

When I came into possession of my estate, my mind was certainly not the best regulated one in the world, nor my character perhaps as well settled and as steadfast as it ought to have been. I was wayward and impulsive; but I was at least truthful and sincere, and gross vice and dissipation had never any charms for me. Meanness and falsehood in every shape I detested. My character was open and transparent to a fault, and anything like deceit or double-dealing thoroughly disgusted me.

Such were my peculiarities when, at about twenty-two years of age, I completed a course of medical study, and received a diploma. The summer of that year I spent in roving among the mountains and watering places of my native State. One evening, while ascending the Valley, towards Staunton, I stopped for the night in Harrisonburg, Rockingham county. A magnificent sunset was just fading out in the west as I left the hotel for an evening stroll, shaping my course in an easterly direction.

The southern end of the Massanutten Mountain, where it terminates abruptly, and seems suddenly to sink into the plain, attracted my attention, and I walked slowly forward, with my eyes fixed upon it, as it lay before me, somewhat to the right of my path.

I soon found myself without the village, and ascending a rising ground, known from the color of the soil, as Red Hill. Within a few rods of a white house which crowns the summit of the hill, a pair of runaway horses, attached to a travelling carriage, containing two ladies and a gentleman, came thundering down at full speed. I had heard the noise for some minutes, but supposing it to be a wagon, and paying no attention to it, the horses were almost on me before I noticed them.

It was too late to throw myself in front of them. After a moment's thought, I watched my opportunity, pressed close to the flying animals, allowed them to pass, and as the carriage flitted before my eyes, leaped on behind it. In an instant I clambered to the front, and snatched the reins from the hands of an old gentleman who was grasping them steadily but feebly. He had thus far kept the frightened horses in the centre of the road; but his hands were trembling, and his strength was fast giving way.

By exerting all the force I could muster, together with some degree of address, I soon managed to check the panic-stricken animals, and finally drove them into the village at a moderate trot. The destination of the party, for the night, was the same hotel at which I was stopping, and in a few minutes we reached it.

One of the ladies had fainted. I took her up in my arms, carried her into the house, and laid her on a sofa. Her looks, her touch, her helpless condition, her long, dark-golden hair streaming over her snowy shoulders, her long, dark eyelashes resting on a skin as pure as alabaster—all these things, and more besides, conspired to produce upon me an impression which was no less novel than delicious.

I informed the old gentleman of my professional character, and continued my efforts to call back to life this beautiful statue, until the landlady arrived. By that time her bosom was beginning to heave, and her eyelids opened heavily. As soon as her eyes met mine, she evidently recognized me as the person who had stopped the horses, and a bright smile and a rosy flush gave that animation to her pallid face which was all her exquisite beauty needed to carry it to perfection. From that moment I was enthralled, captivated, heart and soul.

She was led away to her room by the landlady, and I then learned that her name was Ada Minden, that she was a resident of the city of Baltimore, and that, like myself, she was making a summer tour in Virginia, in company with her friend, Miss Roane, and her friend's uncle, Mr. Roane. They had their own carriage and horses; for travelling facilities, and travellers themselves, indeed, were far from being numerous in Virginia at that day.

The incident I have mentioned was the means of establishing a very intimate acquaintance on my part with the little party of travellers. I remained in their company the whole season, and we visited together many beautiful spots, and among others this wild mountain solitude, which was then much wilder and more solitary than it is now.

In the month of October I accompanied them to Baltimore. From the first moment of our meeting I had loved Ada Minden with all the ardor of my passionate, fiery nature. Like myself she was an orphan. She was living with a distant relative, on a patrimony barely sufficient for the supply of her necessary wants. Early in November we were married.

Before I left Virginia, I had purchased two thousand acres of land in this valley, and as soon as we reached Baltimore I sent thither competent persons to build the cottage you have seen and lay out the grounds. The death of an uncle in England—my last surviving relative—had added largely to my income. I therefore gave my architect carte blanche, merely restricting him to the general outlines of a plan which I had sketched for the principal features of the establishment. Our house could not well be ready before the spring. We therefore spent the winter in Europe, and reached Virginia again in the early days of May. Our agents had proved themselves intelligent and faithful in carrying out my designs for the creation and embellishment of a desirable home in this mountain wilderness, and had done all that art, in that time, could have done, to heighten the very extraordinary natural beauties of the place.

Here we spent three swiftly-gliding years, in a paradise such as few since Adam's fall have ever enjoyed on earth. In the course of our frequent rides through our domain, we often visited the outer cave, and one day, by accident, I discovered these inner ones. Until to-day, no one, I believe, has ever entered them but Ada and myself. No one here, indeed, ever visits even the outer cave, the country people all shunning it as an accursed spot—which indeed it is, though not more so than many other spots in this vicinity, which have never had any special evil reputation.

All the articles you see around you were conveyed hither by myself, by night, and with no little difficulty; and I spared no pains nor expense in fitting it up as a pleasant retreat, where our privacy was in no danger of ever being invaded. It is because of this, because of the solitude which it secures to me, that I inhabit it now, and endure the painful thoughts which memory and association evoke from these silent walls. During the second summer of our residence in this valley, a little daughter was born to us, and my cup of happiness, brimful before, now ran over. It was a felicity too perfect for creatures of a sinful, fallen race, and a vague apprehension of the fact caused its very intensity to make me tremble.

One day, when our little girl was about ten months old, I returned home from a visit to this cave, where I had been reading and writing, and found a man seated on the verandah, and holding the child in his arms. This person was the only visitor we ever had from a distance, and he did not come very often, for I gave him little encouragement to do so. He professed to be a distant relation of my wife's. I disliked the man, and had more than once suspected him of annoying her with impertinent attentions; but she made no complaint, and I curbed my temper as well as I could, though he could not but see that I had no desire for his company.

It affected my nerves most unpleasantly to see this fellow fondling the baby, and I snatched her away abruptly, and placed her in her mother's arms. Scott (that was his name) appeared to take no notice of my ill-humor, but remained with us till after dinner, when he asked me to take a walk with him. I assented, and we walked in this direction, and eventually reached the outer cave, entered it and sat down to rest. After a silence of some minutes' duration, he said to me:

"Dr. Envile, I have a painful duty to perform. I have been hesitating about it ever since your marriage, and I am now resolved to hesitate no longer. You know Mrs. Envile's hand-writing, do you not?"

"That is a very strange question, sir," replied I. "Of course I know it."

"It is a peculiar hand, isn't it—one that would be very difficult to counterfeit?"

"Yes, it is. But what business is it of yours?"

"Excuse me, you will know in a moment. I will ask only one more question. Do me the favor to look at that, and tell me if it is her writing—yes or no."

"Yes—it is her writing."

"You have no doubt about it whatever?"

"None whatever. It is not possible that there should be any. But what is the meaning of this catechizing? What is your object? I demand an answer."

"My object is merely to deliver to you these letters. They came accidentally into my possession, and I felt it to be my duty to place them in your hands. Having done so, my business with you is ended, and I have only to wish you a very good evening."

There was a peculiar, ironical emphasis in the man's words, and a sneering devil in his eye, as he turned and left me, which gave a significance to his adieu beyond its literal meaning. Though I had never been actually jealous of this person, I had certainly been annoyed at the familiarity which he assumed in his intercourse with my wife under cover of his alleged relationship, and had always felt an antipathy to him not unlike that which one feels towards a sneaking, venomous reptile. He had handed me two entire letters, and three fragments. They were all addressed to a man—a man I had never before heard of. With a chill of apprehension, and an involuntary sinking of the heart, I took up the first that came to hand, and opened it.

No hellish torture, contrived to palsy the heart and sear the eyeballs of its victims, could have done its work more quickly or effectually than did the first few lines of that accursed letter. In three minutes fate's lightning had flashed forth from its terrible page, the scathing thunderbolt had fallen upon eye, brain and heart together, and I was the wretched, ruined, heart-broken man you see before you. It needed but the first half-dozen lines to fix my destiny forever; but the damning characters seemed to fascinate me, and I read without stopping every line and word the letters contained. All was written in my wife's singularly beautiful and elaborate Italian hand, which I well knew no human skill could counterfeit; and they breathed in every sentence the most ardent, devoted, passionate, burning love which human heart can feel, or human pen express. One letter, solemnly vowing a love "truer than steel and stronger than death," was dated but thirteen months anterior to our first interview, at Harrisonburg.

There was, alas, no possible room to doubt that I had been the facile dupe of a designing, artful, hypocritical, and perhaps radically wicked woman! It was a matter beyond dispute that she had wilfully deceived me—that she had plighted to me her maiden troth, while her bosom was yet glowing with the amorous fires which another had kindled, and which had been very recently, if at all, extinguished. And worst of all, she had deliberately perjured herself; volunteering the solemn assurance that no thought, even of love for another, had ever agitated her virgin breast. With the fresh poison of this lifelong misery rankling in my heart, I returned to my beautiful home, which could be home to me no more, and immediately sought the presence of my wife. My agitation had by that time subsided, and given place to the ice-cold calmness of despair. I quietly showed her the letters, and asked her if she wrote them.

Struck with confusion, pale and trembling, she nevertheless denied all knowledge of them, or the person to whom they were addressed. It was enough. If she had confessed the truth, or given any proof of repentance, I would at least have pitied her; but as it was, I turned and left her without another word.

As I passed out of the house, I saw the little girl that ever since her birth had been a fountain of delight to my love-thirsty heart. I could not think of tearing her from her mother's arms, and the father's soul within me yearned in agonizing tenderness towards the beautiful babe. But even while I gazed upon her, the conviction fastened itself upon me that there was no shadow of a resemblance in those infant features to my own, and a mocking fiend seemed to whisper in my ear: "It is no child of thine!" And for once, I fear, the devil told the truth. At all events, another arrow had entered my soul, there to fester, a fount of ceaseless agony, as long as memory remains. On my love for Ada I had staked my all. That lost, there remained no earthly thing worth living for; and so hateful had the dull current of existence become, that for long years all that preserved it from utter stagnation was a daily battle with conscience for the privilege of self-murder.

I went immediately to Europe, there to endure "life's fitful fever" as I could, till the mighty physician death should cure it forever. But the unrest which moral tortures like mine must necessarily engender, has driven me onward, like the "Wandering Jew," through every quarter of the globe, savage or civilized, and has eventually forced me to return to this valley, where, like the senseless moth, I flutter round the spot where my heart was so scorched and scathed as almost to have lost the impress of humanity. You now know my reason for speaking to you as I did. I have done my duty, and the responsibility now rests with you alone.

Thus ended the narrative of Dr. Enville. He rose immediately and left the cave. I followed him mechanically, and when we reached the open air he bowed, silently, and disappeared among the trees.

What I had heard disconcerted and annoyed me more than I can express. Mrs. Andrews, as I still continued to call her, had established a character with me and my daughters which it would require very strong evidence indeed to tarnish. But was not the evidence just placed before me as strong as it could well be? It did certainly seem so, but it nevertheless was far from satisfying me of the lady's unworthiness. I knew not how to gainsay it; my reason assented to it, but my heart absolutely refused to admit it.

At the first opportunity, I stated frankly and fully to Mrs. Andrews what I had heard, and from whom I had heard it. With a voice choked by sobs and bitter tears, she described to me the parting interview with her husband, and with a passionate appeal to Heaven to attest the truth of her assertion, she solemnly affirmed her utter ignorance of everything connected with these fatal letters, declaring that she had never written them, never seen them till they were shown to her by her husband, and that she knew no more of the person to whom they were addressed than did the child unborn. That the handwriting and even the style of the letters was so marvellously like her own that she could not distinguish them from others that were her own, she freely admitted; but for all that they were not hers, for the contents were as strange to her as they could possibly be to any one else.

When her husband left her, her friend Mr. Roane had been dead more than a year, and his niece was married and gone to live in the far West, she knew not where. Dr. Enville had left funds sufficient for her support, and she continued to live in Virginia some five or six years after his departure. At the end of that time, however, by an unfortunate investment, she lost nearly every dollar she possessed. She then removed to Alabama, partly to get rid of her disagreeable cousin (the man who had exhibited the fatal letters, who was a rejected suitor, and who still annoyed her with his attentions), and partly in search of employment by which she might support herself. She finally obtained a situation as a teacher, and continued to reside in the far South until she left it to take up her abode with me.

Her feelings upon now revisiting the scene of her former happiness, and her desire to behold once more the cottage and the grounds, and the cave, of which she alone, besides her husband, possessed the secret, will be readily understood and appreciated. The more this mysterious affair was inquired into, the darker it became. But still my confidence in the much-stricken lady whom it so nearly concerned, was steadfast and unshaken. I felt satisfied that her husband had judged her too hastily, and as I thought time would show, too harshly also. Nor did I think that her emotion at the first sight of the letters was any certain proof of either falsehood or duplicity.

The morning after my conference with her, I sought and obtained another interview with her husband, and urged him to take some steps with a view to clearing up the mystery which hung over this affair. He replied that he did not believe any mystery existed. The letters were his wife's; and though she denied the fact, it would be as easy to prove that white was black, as to make that denial good. He then spoke of obtaining a divorce, and I soon discovered that I was doing more harm than good, and consequently beat a precipitate retreat; being resolved, however, to do all I could to probe to the bottom what seemed to me to be so strangely and so mischievously inexplicable.

The next day we left the valley; but not till I had put in execution a project which I had conceived during my visit to the cave. With the mother's permission I took aside the daughter, Alice, a sweet and lovely girl, and told her the whole story. She was greatly shocked, and for a time violently agitated, but when she grew calmer I communicated to her my project, to which she agreed at once. It was simply this; that she should remain at the cottage, and pass for a relative of the farmer, on a visit. It was my hope that Enville might be attracted towards her, without knowing, of course, who she really was. We gave the farmer a liberal fee and left him. My plan eventually succeeded beyond my expectations. Alice soon found means to throw herself in her father's way, and in a short time they became every-day companions. It was not long before the morose and melancholy man began to respond to her filial attentions, though suspecting nothing of her real personality; and she eventually exercised upon him an influence of a most salutary character, and prepared the way for what I hoped would finally prove a reunion of long-sundered hearts.

In the meantime, I undertook to discover, if possible, some one who was well acquainted with the early history of Ada Minden, which might, I thought, throw some light on the one great and fatal mystery of her life, which, I felt convinced, was no less a mystery to her than it was to me. In this purpose I was successful, and in a quarter where I had not anticipated it.

Harmon Scott, the man who had exhibited the letters to Dr. Enville, was the only person I knew of who was likely to possess the information I was seeking. But could he be induced to communicate it? I feared not. Such a thing was highly improbable. Suddenly a thought struck me, and as soon as I succeeded in finding the man, I put my idea in practice. I had resolved to obtain by moral force what I felt sure "moral suasion" would be very unlikely to accomplish. Choosing well my time, therefore, I so worked upon the fears of this base poltroon, that he told me the whole truth, and enabled me to clear up the mystery to my entire satisfaction, without any additional research, further than I thought desirable for the corroboration of his own statement, and for the more certain enlightenment of the prejudiced and skeptical husband. The history of this affair involved a singular physiological, or rather pathological phenomenon, which, though of rare occurrence, is, nevertheless a well authenticated and established fact. While still very young, Ada Minden's love had been won by a young gentleman of great worth, and singularly attractive both in mind and person; and after their solemn betrothal, she did not hesitate to lavish upon him a wealth of affection, which, though pure as the virgin snows, was nevertheless all glowing with the warmth of an unusually ardent, passionate temperament, and a tender, susceptible heart. It may well be imagined what fervid letters would spring from such a love. The wedding day was fixed, and the bridal party assembled; but the long-expected bridegroom never came. Instead of a merry marriage peal, the old church bell rang out the knell of a departed soul, and for the gay and brilliant epithalamium was substituted a funeral dirge. Ada's lover was thrown violently from his horse but a few minutes after leaving his father's door, and was borne back into the house a mangled and bloody corpse.

The terrible news was communicated to Ada with ill-advised abruptness, and its effects were fearful to behold. It seemed to set her brain on fire. Fever, delirium, frenzy of the most alarming character speedily followed, and raged with unabated violence for many days. Finally it left her, but so weak, so utterly prostrated in both mind and body, that no one dared to believe it possible that she could ever recover. She did, however, and by slow degrees rose up from the very jaws of the grave, already open to receive her.

After many weary months of tedious convalescence her health was fully restored, and her shattered mind renovated, except that everything connected with her illness, even in the most remote degree, was utterly blotted out of her memory, and was as if it had never been. Not only the letters she had written to her lover, and his subsequent death, but even the very existence of such a person were steeped in some mysterious Lethe and made to fade away forever. It was a curious case, but by no means without a parallel in the annals of medical science. Fearing some unfortunate result of a contrary procedure, the physician earnestly enjoined it upon all who had become acquainted with the circumstances (and there were not many such in Baltimore) to never, on any account, allude to them in conversation with her, or in her presence. Her few friends and associates rigidly complied with this injunction, and it was not strange that the facts had never come to the ears of Dr. Envile during his brief courtship.

The moment I became possessed of these facts, I hurried home, and in company with the hardly-used and much afflicted lady hastened to the romantic valley, the scene of her short-lived happiness. There I was fortunate enough to find her husband still lingering, detained by the gently soothing ministrations of his unknown daughter. When I had told him all, I found my task a much easier one than I had anticipated. As a medical man he was prepared to acknowledge as truth what many persons, not so well-informed, would have received with scorn and ridicule. His intercourse with Alice, too, had done much to smooth down his stubborn misanthropy, and when, after listening to my story, he was finally assured that the sweet girl was his long-estranged daughter, his self-hardened heart melted in a flood of tears, while he bitterly accused himself of brutal precipitation, cruelty and injustice towards the gentle-hearted woman who had given him so many proofs of the truest, most self-sacrificing affection.

The bitter cynic, the pitiless man-hater, wept as if his heart would break, and his loud sobs were heard in the adjoining cavern, and brought thence his wife and daughter, with streaming eyes, and hearts overflowing with gratitude to Heaven. Let us drop the curtain on a scene too sacred to be intruded upon, even if an adequate description were within the scope of our feeble abilities. Suffice it to say that all the gloomy past was forgiven and forgotten, and that there were few happier hearts that day in Virginia than those which beat in the wild mountain cave by the GRAVE OF ONONTAWA.

LOOKS.

Thy mild looks are all eloquent,
Thy bright ones free and glad;
Like glances from a placid sea,
Thy sad ones sweetly sad.—ROBERT MORRIS.

THE END OF GREATNESS.

Alexander, after having climbed to the dizzy heights of ambition, and, with his temples bound with chaplets dipped in the blood of countless nations, looked down upon a conquered world, and wept that there was not another city for him to conquer, set a city on fire, and died in a scene of debauch.

Hannibal, after having, to the astonishment and consternation of Rome, passed the Alps, after having put to flight the armies of the mistress of the world, and stripped three bushels of gold rings from the fingers of her slaughtered knights, and made her foundation quake—fled from his country, being chased by one of those who exultingly united his name to that of God, and called him Hanni Baal—died at last by poison administered by his own hand, unlamented, unwept, in a foreign land.

Cæsar, after having conquered eight hundred cities, and dyed his clothes in the blood of one million of his foes; after having pursued to death the only rival he had on earth, was miserably assassinated by those he considered his nearest friends, and in that very place, the attainment of which had been his greatest ambition.

Bonaparte, whose mandate kings and emperors obeyed, after having filled the earth with the terror of his name, deluged it with blood, and clothed the world with sackcloth, closed his days in lonely banishment—almost literally exiled from the world, yet where he could sometimes see his country's banner waving over the deep, but could not, or would not bring him aid.

Thus, four great men, who, from the peculiar situation of their portraits, seemed to stand the representatives of all the world calls great—those four, who each in turn made the world tremble to its centre by their simple tread, severally died—one by intoxication, or some suppose, by poison mingled in wine; one a suicide; one murdered by his friends, and one in lonely exile.—Providence Herald.

COAL GAS ON PLANTS.

A collection of exotic plants in a greenhouse, in Philadelphia, was, through the breakage of the city "mains," and the consequent leakage of a large amount of gas, exposed to its deleterious influence. The plants, numbering nearly three thousand, were almost entirely ruined. Those in leaf did not suffer, nor did a row of maple trees immediately over the leak; the injury sustained being entirely through their breathing organs. The general sympathy known to exist between the genera of the same natural order, extends to the action of this deleterious substance upon them. The beautiful Amantiacæ were so keenly sensitive to the poison, that even large old specimens were stripped at once. The floor was covered with leaves, and oranges and lemons in all stages of growth, from first fruit formed to that fully matured. The trees by careful pruning and nursing, were somewhat restored. Camellias were in bloom in about 120 varieties; not a leaf, bud, or flower remained upon the largest and the finest plants.—Timbs's Curiosities of Science.

HIGHER, STILL HIGHER.

BY LIKEN MORSE.

The moon from the east, in her glimmering car,
 Urgeth her steeds towards the keen zenith star;
 And her spokes and her tires dash silvery spray
 Down the cool silent air, in her radiant way,
 As she goadeth her team, with an eager desire
 To wheel up the skies, "O, higher, still higher!"

And the wild eagle, feeding her clamorous young,
 Shakes off the dews that cool o'er her clung,
 And springs from her home on the old mountain high,
 And spreads her wings darkly along on the sky,
 Till her plumes seem to burn in the blazing fire—
 Yet exulting she screams, "O, higher, still higher!"

And the billows draw on their frothing white shrouds,
 And beat their bald heads on the low-flying clouds,
 As thin they would burst the dim, murky pall
 That hangs on the wing of the swift-flying squall,
 And plunge in the lights that over them flame,
 And hungering, "Higher, O, higher!" the same.

And the century oak, that defied all the blasts,
 For ages, of lightnings that harmless it passed,
 And beat 'gainst the stars through all the night long,
 Catching low bars of their triumphal song—
 Yet still now it moans, in each quivering lyre—
 "Upward and onward—O, higher, still higher!"

The lark in the grass by her dew-lighted nest,
 Smooths o'er the plumes on her song-swelling breast,
 When amber flames rain o'er the eastern skies,
 And the purple air parts, while singing she flies—
 Her chant growing wilder, and her wings never tire,
 As she floats like a star, "O, higher, still higher!"

And thus, O man, thou likenest them all!
 Like meteors they rise, like meteors they fall;
 Though you blaze like a rocket along on the sky,
 Yet prone in the earth you darkly must lie.
 Then pray that thy spirit, with a holy desire,
 Shall wing in the skies, "O, higher, still higher!"

How Kitty Forrester was tamed.

BY M. M. HAVEN.

It was in the freshness and beauty of June in the country—when the birds were abroad from dawn till sunset, when the fragrance of the faded apple blossoms yet lingered in the air, when the grass was tender and bright in its early growth, and when the mighty old trees around Kitty Forrester's home were massive domes of lustrous green, swaying in the summer wind, and throwing soft shadows upon the turf—shadows which were now long and dark, for it was late in the afternoon.

It was Saturday afternoon, too, when, in New England farm-houses, the week's work is all "done up," and the cool, quiet apartments wear a look as if nothing was to be done in them again forevermore; the wind coming in at the open windows gently stirs the drooping asparagus boughs that fill the fireplace—the only visible motion—and the sharp, positive click of the tall clock in the corner is the only sound heard. Saturday afternoon! Suggestive of long rows of pies, with crisp, flaky crusts, huge loaves of bread, snowy wheaten and golden brown, and joints of meat of a most appetizing odor—delightful foretastes of the Sunday dinner.

Looking into Mrs. Grimes's pantry, and seeing all these toothsome delicacies nicely arranged along the white shelves, you would have sympathized with the satisfaction which irradiated the good old lady's countenance, as she surveyed these results of her own and her daughter's skill. Ruth, the daughter, was moving quietly about in the large, pleasant kitchen, deftly arranging the table for tea. She is a comely, rosy-cheeked girl, and there is a handiness in all her movements, that pleases the eye. Ruth is a model housewife, no doubt. Dorcas, the elder daughter, is sitting by the window, sewing, pausing now and then to throw a glance out over the fields and up the road. She is not so pretty as Ruth, you would say. Mrs. Grimes has come out of the pantry now, and stands at a side table, cutting slices from the wheaten loaf. The soft clink of the dishes goes on under Ruth's skilful hands, not loud enough to drown the talk.

"Do you see anything of him yet, Dorcas?" questions Mrs. Grimes; and Ruth steps back from the table, so as to come within range of the window.

"No, mother, there's no one in sight yet," was Dorcas's reply.

"Where's Kitty?" asks Mrs. Grimes, presently.

"She is up stairs, I guess," answered Ruth. "She has been arranging some flowers to put in his room."

"I don't think the minister will thank her for her pains," remarked Dorcas. "I trust he is occupied with more solemn things. And as for Kitty, she had better be making shirts for the heathen."

"I suppose she will come down pretty soon, with her hair looking like a fright, and her dress tumbled up and stained all over. She would sit right down on the grass," chimed in Ruth.

Just then there was a breezy rush along the passage way, a tripping of light feet, and Kitty Forrester burst into the room, dropping the corner of her apron in her effort to shut the door, and letting fall, as she did so, a shower of blossoms and leaves and stems, that gave the spotless floor a sadly littered appearance.

"Now, Kitty Forrester, what does possess you?" exclaimed Mrs. Grimes, in a distressed tone. "You do beat anything I ever see—and just look at her dress, girls! Did you ever?"

"I told you so, Kitty," said Ruth, by way of consolation.

"You ought not to let her wear such things," remarked Dorcas. "What is the use of white muslin for such a romp as she is? Now that dress would make over beautifully for the poor little Sandwich Island babies."

"But they won't get it though!" murmured Kitty, in a vexed tone; and pushing back her short curls, she stooped down to repair the disorder she had made.

But the curls would fall into her eyes, and the eyes would fill with tears, and the awkward little hands made small progress, for all the while Aunt Abigail stood watching her like an avenging Fate. The tidy lady lost all patience, at last.

"There, you might as well go away, you careless, wicked girl! You only make it worse. Go and get me the broom. I'll tell you what, Kitty Forrester," continued Mrs. Grimes, emphasizing her words by vigorous sweeps with the broom aforesaid, "if you don't turn over a new leaf, and set about doing something, and leave off kiltering all over the fields like a wild cat, I'll get the minister to take you in hand. I've talked and talked till I'm tired of it."

"I don't care if you do!" sobbed Kitty, in a burst of passionate tears. "I don't care anything about the minister. I never mean to speak to him—so!" And the naughty little gipsy rushed out of the room and away down through the lane, as if all the graduating class of the theological seminary were in full chase.

While Kitty is gone, and Aunt Abigail and her girls condole with each other over their "trial," we will talk a little about her. You know we naturally fall to talking of our friends as soon as their backs are turned. If a quiet family were to take a comet to board, the erratic guest would not whisk about and overturn and upset things generally with more celerity than did Kitty Forrester when she made her advent into the family of sober Deacon Grimes.

Such a staid, order-loving household it was! such a clockwork nicety pervaded all its arrangements! And to have all this method and system annihilated by Kitty Forrester! No wonder Mrs. Grimes declared it was a "trial;" no wonder housewifely Ruth and prim Dorcas echoed the complaint, and played upon it with variations, till even the easy, good-natured deacon groaned in spirit that he had been born her uncle. How he rued the day that young Harry Forrester, in one of his college vacations, found his way up into the country village and wooed and won sweet Mary Grimes, in the beauty of her budding girlhood—the fair promise of a rich maturity which was never to be fulfilled, for the third summer the violets bent over the grave of the child-wife. And when, ere many years, Harry Forrester came to Bingley, to wander listlessly about through a weary summer of illness and depression, and at last lay down to a peaceful sleep under the falling leaves, it was in a temporary softening of the heart that Mr. Grimes adopted the orphan into his family—a generosity which Kitty's freaks made him almost or quite repent of.

Schoolmaster and schoolmistress alike bore testimony to her incorrigible wildness. Was a piece of mischief done? Who could be at the bottom of it but Kitty Forrester? Many a time did Kitty get the credit of some roguish prank that she was as innocent of as a lamb; and the poor little puss had been tried, condemned, and almost executed so many times, upon circumstantial evidence, that she had grown impatient of even the slightest reproof.

And yet everybody loved Kitty—at least everybody except the deacon's family. If she was quick-tempered, she was so warm-hearted and generous, her tears flowed so freely for another's sorrows, she had such a blithe spirit and such arch, captivating ways—who could help loving her? A few wiser, kinder persons than the rest, hinted at the bad system of repression which the child had grown up under, talked about the free, nature-loving tastes that drew her out into the woods and fields, and suggested that those large capacities would richly repay a careful nurture; but these whispers never came to the ears that might have profited by them—and so Kitty was seventeen and not yet tamed, had not a single web of linen spun, nor a calico quilt pieced up, did not know dimity from huckabuck, and never turned a cheese in her life.

It was nothing that she knew by heart whole books of poetry, and could tell you the name of every flower that grew within ten miles of Bingley—she was an ignorant little goose for all that, and would never make a good farmer's wife in the world. Not so, however, thought Charlie Brown, a tall young farmer who came every Saturday evening and sat two hours in the "front room" in a state of singular embarrassment as to his hands and feet, and glowing with admiration for the wild little Kit. An eye for beauty had Charlie Brown, if not for thrift.

She had such a piquant little face, so fresh and bright, with sunny, golden-brown curls and such sweet, blue eyes! As for teeth, lips, arms—throw in pearls, coral and ivory, ad libitum, and you have the picture. But you cannot paint the winsome ways, the saucy shrug of the round shoulder, and the defiant toss of the pretty head.

The atmosphere has cooled again, after the passion burst, the tea is all ready, and Miss Dorcas, looking up the road, sees a coming vehicle, and the expected clerical guest seated therein.

"This is pleasant!" soliloquized the Reverend Henry Oxford, as he opened the gate and passed up the walk under the shadow of the elms. "Now for a realization of my ideals—now for embodying my day dreams. I shall like the green fields and these great trees. I wonder if that is my room, where the woodbine runs over the window!"

They were all in the portico to receive him—all but Kitty; the deacon with his blue frock replaced by a clean linen coat, Aunt Abigail in her best cap, Ruth smoothing down her braids with a fluttering hand, and Dorcas, erect and prim.

The welcome was cordial and kind, and the young minister, taking in at a glance the fresh, sweet air of the chamber to which he was conducted, resumed his self-congratulations.

"Did ever another poor, toil-worn student find such a home as this?" And he gazed with a loving eye out upon the June landscape, and then turned again to the fragrant blossoms upon his table.

How Aunt Abigail's face assumed another shade of complacency, while she listened to the praises Henry Oxford knew would be grateful.

"Really, Mrs. Grimes, I haven't tasted any such bread since I was a boy. It is like that my mother used to make."

"This is Ruth's making," replied Mrs. Grimes, giving her cap-strings a little pull, "but I don't think she had quite so good luck as usual—did you, Ruth?"

"No, mother. The yeast wasn't quite lively enough," said Ruth, modestly.

"Nothing could be nicer," remarked the young minister, testifying his appreciation by accepting a second slice; "and with this sweet butter, it is really delicious."

"Ruth is a good hand to make butter," returned Mrs. Grimes. "I sometimes think she has a better knack at making it come waxy than I ever had, though folks did use to praise my butter."

"Mr. Oxford," put in Dorcas, in her turn, "is there any recent news from the mission at Borriboola Gha?"

There was just the faintest suggestion of a smile in Henry Oxford's eyes, as he answered:

"Indeed I cannot tell. I must refer you to the Herald. For myself," he continued, more earnestly, "though I am eager to forward the work of our Master abroad, I have been more particularly interested, of late, in the effort to reclaim the vicious and degraded of our own large cities. It is a work that needs doing."

"Dorcas thinks so, too," chimed in the deacon, meekly.

"By the way, Mrs. Grimes," said the minister, presently, "it was a real deed of charity to place those flowers in my room. I am very grateful for it." And he glanced at Ruth.

"O, that's only Kitty Forrester's work!" replied Mrs. Grimes. "The child's head is full of such nonsense. She's such a trial!" And a sigh closed the sentence—sigh the second from Miss Dorcas—sigh the third from Miss Ruth.

The robins were chanting their matins when, the next morning, Henry Oxford threw up the window and looked out upon the woodbine, wet with dew. O the beauty, the sweet repose of a Sabbath morning in the country! The young minister had a heart and a will to join in the great hymn which goes up to God at such times, and now he longed to be abroad where the harmony would rush over his soul in grander sweeps; so he stole softly down stairs, undid the old-fashioned bolt, and was abroad in the June air. He wandered on the lane, across the pastures, gathering the violets as he went, and then into a wood whose cathedral trees arched above him more majestically than any minister of man's making could do, and where the birds sang His praises as no human voices can. Trees are mighty teachers, and there is no orator so eloquent as the forest silence.

Henry Oxford bared his head reverently in that lofty presence—and who shall say that the earnest aspirations which struggled heavenward in the morning prayer at the village church, were not inspired by communion with the voiceless woods? After a time, Mr. Oxford thought he distinguished the tinkling of waters in the distance, and lured on by the music, he threaded the winding forest path and presently came to a small stream restricted to a narrow channel and leaping over obstructing rocks with a resolute, cheerful vigor of purpose that made one's heart glad. The brook was lovely; and perchance the young minister might have found volumes therein, had not another vision dawned upon him, effectually putting to flight all his previous fancies. It was a charming vision—a young maiden with floating curls and dimpled cheeks, one foot daintily poised on a stepping-stone, her hat ribbons trailing in the water, and both hands full of flowers. It was a comical picture, too.

"Are you the Naiad of the stream? Have you been seeking pearls to sprinkle your locks withal?" he said in a roguish, yet respectful way.

"No, sir. I am only Kitty Forrester, been to gather violets," said the little gipsy, demurely.

And this was Kitty Forrester's introduction to the minister.

The leafy glory of June had ripened into the luxuriance of midsummer, the violets were gone, save here and there a tardy loiterer, the leaves had fallen from the roses, and the west wind blowing softly across the dewy field was sweet with the scent of the new-mown hay.

Henry Oxford was quite at home in Bingley already. His genial, popular manners preposessed the people in his favor, and the real earnestness of purpose and loftiness of aim which they found in him, strengthened his hold upon their affections. His sympathy for the poor and neglected was no shallow sentiment. He found out the untaught and uncared-for, who lark in the outskirts of every country village, and became their friend and adviser. The worldly-minded farmers were interested by his simplicity and sincerity, and unfamiliar faces began to be seen in the church. His power of winning affection was almost marvellous. There were no limits to his popularity. There was only one thing that the minister needed; all agreed that if this defect was supplied, Mr. Oxford would be a model minister, and Bingley the most fortunate of parishes. The parsonage was all ready—a most charming place, too—a cottage half hidden by shrubbery and climbing roses—a perfect gem of a parsonage it was! What more could be wanted but a bird to put in the cage? How the kind matrons pitied poor Henry Oxford's bachelor condition, and how unweariedly they strove to rescue him from his gloomy celibacy!

How faithfully Miss Dorcas learned the Herald by heart, and how industriously she worked on the garments for the heathen! With what careful solicitude Ruth compounded her pastry, and tended the dairy! I think the minister should have been very grateful for such disinterested sympathy.

As for wild Kitty Forrester—nobody minded her. Aunt Abigail, indeed, thought it was very kind in Mr. Oxford to take so much interest in the careless girl, and united with Dorcas and Ruth in hoping that Kitty would be tamed. There was the more reason to hope for this, since Kitty was altogether more respectful in her behaviour toward Mr. Oxford than they had expected, and condescended to listen to his advice, and even reproofs, without pouting her rosy lips.

Kitty herself did not know what to make of the minister. His manner toward her was a mingling of command and deference, softened by gentleness so peculiar, that the little puss was quite bewildered. He gave her carte blanche to the shelves of his library with the air of a man asking a favor; but if she selected a volume not to his liking, he took it away unceremoniously, and bade her go for another. One thing Kitty was sure of—he was not stupid; and all the pious people whom she had ever known had been—O, so stupid! that the two were inseparably associated in her mind. In every way, then, Henry Oxford was a new revelation to her. You have seen the wild rose, growing alone in tangled luxuriance, and sending forth its shoots after its own wayward will, till sometimes it offends the eye by its want of symmetry; but take it into your garden, trim it a little here, and straighten its branches there, let in the sun upon this side, and give it a support upon that, round off the angles of Nature into the shapely curves of Art; and it becomes your most beautiful shrub, never losing its own native grace, but discovering daily new harmony of proportions, and blossoming all over into beauty and fragrance. So with Kitty. She did not lose her frolicsome, kitten-like ways all at once, but by-and-by there was a wiser, deeper look in her eyes, and a graver cadence in her voice; her gayety was softened by a quiet thoughtfulness, her abrupt manner grew more gentle, and now in the dawn of womanhood, just beginning to catch a glimpse of its great mysteries, and looking back half wistfully upon the free, childish life which was every day becoming more and more a thing of the past, Kitty Forrester was more winning than ever.

No one would have suspected that so great a change was being wrought in the young girl. You can never tell when the buds become blossoms—it is the work of a summer morning; but for many a week the petals have been getting ready to expand, and a little sunshine unfolds them. And Kitty, living in the light of Henry Oxford's presence, developed with wonderful quickness the capacities that many a summer had nurtured. Now and then, however, upon some extraordinary provocation, her impulsive nature broke forth in the old, impetuous way.

Meantime Charlie Brown presented himself in the deacon's front room as regularly as Saturday night came round, on which occasions Kitty sat silent by the window, gazing out into the darkness, and listening with supreme contempt to Charlie's very original remarks, which were generally to the effect that he "guessed we was a goin' ter hev a dry spell," or that "the taters needed hillin' up awful bad." No wonder Kitty hated labor, since it was to her synonymous with coarseness and uncouthness.

One of the hardest of Kitty's trials was that Aunt Abigail always spoke as if she belonged as a matter of course to Charlie Brown; and many a time did she run away into the woods, or up garret, to escape this infliction, which was especially distasteful when the minister was by to hear. One evening, after an escapade of this kind, Kitty was gliding softly in at the front door, hoping to reach her chamber unnoticed, when her own name, pronounced by Mrs. Grimes, checked her steps a moment.

"It'll be a good match for the child," Aunt Abigail was saying; "an' I'm sorry she don't take to it no better. I wish you'd advise her, Mr. Oxford. She might pay some attention to what you'd say."

"I will, my dear madam—I will advise her as I think is for her good."

Kitty's sense of honor compelled her to retreat, but the old staircase creaked fearfully, and her dread of being betrayed retarded her movements; and so the rest of the conversation came to her ear.

"So do, Mr. Oxford," said Mrs. Grimes, in a gratified tone. "If your influence could make something of Kitty, I should bless the day you came to Bingley, for mercy knows what a trial she's been!"

"Never you fear, Mrs. Grimes," replied the minister. "I'll tame her—yes, I'll tame Kitty."

This climax was too much for the little puss. She reached her own room in a rage.

"He will advise me, will he? He will tame me! See if I ever read another book of his! I'll never speak to him again—never!" And she broke down into a sob. "And he wants me to marry Charlie Brown—a great, ignorant booby! I never will—never—if they kill me. And for him to take sides with them—it's too bad—it's shameful!" And the sobs quite vanquished her this time.

I do not know whether any of Kitty's air-castles were blown down in this tempest. You must watch closely, if you find out the secrets that lie wrapped up in the rosebuds, and after all, they may die and never speak. I only know that she was very cool towards the minister after that, assuming an air of dignity that was charmingly comical; and the next Saturday evening, when Charlie Brown came, she absolutely had the audacity to refuse to go down.

Henry Oxford could find no opportunity to give her the advice he had promised, though he sought for it earnestly—for of course he meant to keep his word with Aunt Abigail. But fortune favors the brave, and one moonlight night he caught Miss Kitty in the garden, and the frightened little thing could not escape.

"Now, Kitty Forrester, what new freak is this? What is the matter, Kitty?"

"Nothing, sir." And Kitty retreated to the further end of the rustic bench, and looked imploringly up into the old elm, as if she meditated a flight in that direction.

"Nothing! Precisely what I expected. Kitty," continued Mr. Oxford, laying aside his jesting tone for a very grave one, "Kitty, I promised your aunt I would give you some advice, and—"

He did not finish the sentence, for Kitty turned towards him, quite crimson with anger, and burst forth impetuously:

"I don't want any advice—I wont take any—and you needn't call me Kitty any more—my name is Katherine Forrester!"

"Katherine Forrester," said Mr. Oxford, perfectly unmoved, "your aunt wishes you to marry Charlie Brown—"

"I wont marry Charlie Brown—never—and it is very cruel in you to say anything about it," interrupted Kitty, with flashing eyes, but with a great tremble in her voice. "I will never marry anybody!"

"But, Katherine Forrester, Charlie Brown loves you!"

"I don't care if he does."

"And you love him."

"No, I don't—I hate him!" with a burst of tears.

"I am truly rejoiced to hear it," said the minister.

Kitty stopped crying, too much amazed to go on.

"Because, Kitty," said Henry Oxford, speaking very low, "I love you, and I want you to love me, and be my wife!"

If the great elm had broken loose from its moorings and sailed away into the sky, Kitty could not have been more astonished. But of course she was properly indignant—for hadn't she just told him she would never marry anybody? And now to think of such assurance!

Of course she let him know, speedily, that she wasn't going to be whiffled about in that way, and change her mind in a minute—not she. I suppose she told him so—only how does it happen that Kitty Forrester writes her name "Mrs. Henry Oxford," and resides at Bingley parsonage?

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S BLUNDER.

BY JOHN D. ROBINSON.

ROBERT ELLIS and his brother James were about as striking examples of the dissimilarities which frequently exist in the same family as can well be imagined. Robert was a fine, frank-hearted fellow, with a ruddy countenance, open as the day. James was mean and miserly. Shriveled, shrunk, squalid in aspect, he looked what he was. His pinching parsimony, it was said, had broken his wife's heart, and had driven his son, his only child, from the door. These latter matters, however, had occurred years before the date of our story.

Though James Ellis had amassed much property, he lived in the meanest and most wretched way, keeping house, or rather hovel, alone, and denying himself even the necessaries of life. Most unlike this was Robert's method of living. He had been in business, and had earned for himself a comfortable competency, and he enjoyed it in comfort. Robert had never been married, but he was not, therefore, without a family; for he had taken to his home and heart a poor widowed sister. And this sister had a daughter who had become the apple of old Robert's eye. She had come to his care as a child, and each succeeding year had ripened in the old man's love.

"Ah, Luce," he would say, after making her some present, "I am just giving thee a staff to break my own head. Thou lookest so handsome now with that bonnet, and those ribbons, that all the young sparks must fall in love with thee. And what would thy poor old Uncle Robert do without thee, girl?"

But the worthy old man fell ill, became sick almost unto death. Illness was a thing Robert had scarcely known in his lifetime, and this attack reminded him forcibly of what health too often makes men forget, namely, the necessity of arranging his affairs so that things might go as he wished after his death. His property lay chiefly in houses, and he wished to give his sister a life tenure of that property, and to constitute his niece ultimate heir to all. Without a will, this disposition of the property could not be made, as Robert's brother, who was heir-at-law, would otherwise be entitled to all.

To accomplish this making of the will, the village schoolmaster's talents were put in requisition, for the schoolmaster was a will-maker in general, at least had often acted in that capacity, and thought himself very perfect in the calling. He had one form for all cases; and accordingly when Robert Ellis communicated his wishes to him, the schoolmaster drew up a will agreeably to this form. According to his friend's wish, the schoolmaster himself was named executor, a post which he held in nine out of ten will cases with which he had to do.

When the schoolmaster came to old Robert's bedside with the will to have it signed and witnessed, Lucy sat near her kind uncle. Her mother was also in the room engaged in knitting. Neither she nor Lucy knew of the commission which Robert had given to the schoolmaster, and when it was communicated to them they were moved to tears, partly of gratitude and partly of affectionate anxiety.

"O, dear uncle," said Lucy, "you will be spared to us yet."

"A little while, perhaps, but not long; not long now. The blow has been given, and the first high wind will bring down the tree," said the old man, calmly.

The invalid signed the will, and under the direction of the schoolmaster Lucy and her mother signed their names to it, along with his own, as witnesses.

After the completion of this deed, Robert lived several weeks in tolerable health. But a second attack of the same nature as the first, terminated his days. For the first time for many years, James Ellis entered his brother's house on the occasion of the burial. He had become more squalid and haggard than ever, and though evidently verging rapidly to the grave, still grasped at wealth with as keen a hand as ever. Some thought they observed on his countenance gleams of wild eagerness breaking at times, as if unconsciously, through the show of gravity he wore as he followed his brother to the tomb. Certain it is that his disappointment was obvious to every one present when the will of the deceased was read. The countenance of the miser fell when he heard the deed gone over. His limbs shook, and he glanced with his dark, cunning eyes at the innocent inheritors, as if they had robbed him of his treasure. He had so much self-restraint as not to break out into abuse, but he would partake of nothing with the other friends of the family, and left the house with a drooping head, and with mutterings on his lips. His character and peculiarities were too well-known to his sister and his niece for them to feel surprise at his behaviour.

About a week after the funeral, the schoolmaster in his capacity of executor waited on Lucy's mother, and informed her it would be necessary to prove the will in the proper court, and proposed that she and Lucy should go with him to a friend of his, an attorney, in order to get the matter completed. Of course the proposal was immediately acceded to.

On reaching the lawyer's office the special will of Robert Ellis, drawn up and signed as already mentioned, was shown to the legal practitioner. He had not looked at it a few minutes, when he discovered it to be totally useless and invalid. By law every devise in such a will, to an attesting witness, is void, and of no avail. Lucy and her mother were placed in this position through the consummate ignorance of the person who had undertaken to be their guide in the matter. When the attorney with a grave face, but kindly tone intimated this sad error, the heart of the poor widow sank within her, as she looked at her daughter, and as the recollection of the heir-at-law's character came across her mind. And as for the schoolmaster, who was really a kind, worthy man, his self-accusations were exceedingly bitter. But he tried to reassure himself and his friends with the hope that the flaw would never be known, and that if it were known, James Ellis could not be so cruel and unjust as to take away what it was undeniably his dead brother's wish to give to those who now had it.

The attorney shook his head at the latter observation of the schoolmaster, and said that secrecy, to say the least of it, was the better security of the two. To the preservation of silence on the subject he at once pledged himself, and trusted that the flaw might not be heard of. The schoolmaster then departed with Lucy and her mother, all three, it must be confessed, much depressed in spirits.

Alas, evil news spreads fast. Whether James Ellis had himself observed the circumstance of the signatures at the reading of the will, or whether some other person had detected the error, and promulgated it, we are unable to say. But the flaw did come to the notice of James Ellis. The attorney candidly told him that he believed all men would allow the intentions of the testator to be represented by the will, but those intentions most certainly had not been made good in such a way as to stand a contest in a court. Lucy and her mother returned to their home, and the cheerful girl for a living took in needlework.

There let us leave them, cheerful and resigned, and turn to the miser. This day he has added another half at least to his wealth, and he is still in his wretched old hovel. Though the night is one of winter he has no fire, but he lies in bed with his clothes on, and all the rags in his possession heaped upon him to keep him warm. Yet this night all will not do, for he shivers incessantly. Ever and anon, however, the thought of his newly-acquired wealth sends something like a glow through him. Lying in bed saves candles—this was also a part of his creed. Has he no remorse for turning a sister and her child to the door? It is hard to say what are his thoughts, but latterly he has seemed excited, but apparently more with joy than any other feeling. But hark! there is a tap at his door. It is unheeded, and is repeated again and again. At last the miser cries:

"Who is there?"

"It is I—I am seeking shelter—do you not know me?"

"You can get no shelter here, whoever you are," cried the miser.

"Father, do you not know me? It is I, Charles Ellis, your son!"

There was silence for a time within, until the same words were repeated, when the miser growled:

"Go away, I do not believe you!"

"Father, I am very cold, and I am in want of shelter. You surely know my voice; open the door and you will see that I am Charles."

"Whoever you are, go away," cried the inmate, in still huskier tones, "you can get nothing here."

After a few more words the colloquy ended, and all was again silent.

On the following morning, a young man, genteelly dressed, and with his handsome face deeply browned by sun and air, called at the dwelling of the widow and her daughter. As soon as the latter saw the stranger, a glow of surprise rushed over her cheeks, and she sprang forward a step, but checked herself. The stranger, however, made the rest of the advance, and caught her in his arms and kissed her.

"Cousin Charles!" exclaimed Lucy.

"Ay, ay, Luce," cried the young man, "you used to say you would know me a mile off when we were children, but I think you had some doubts just now."

Warm was the welcome which the young man received from his aunt and Lucy, for when a boy he had always been a great favorite with them. He told them his story—he had been to the West Indies and had been prosperous.

He himself was the first to enter on the disagreeable subject of his father's conduct, which had been detailed to him by the landlord of the inn where he had slept. His visit to his father at night was also described to them. He had gone, he said, to try if his father would permit him to be a son to him; but he found his heart to be as cold and as hard as ever.

"But fear not, Cousin Luce," said he, "thou shalt have all I have, though it is not much, after all, but you and your mother shall be comfortable. And who knows, when he sees me in the light of day, the old man may relent after all."

He did not relent. Things were so ordered that it could not be. When the old woman who had brought him a light every morning for more than ten years, entered his abode, the morning after the occurrence related, the miserable miser was dead—cold as ice—he had been literally frozen to death.

His death turned the fortune of his kind old brother once more into the right channel. Charles married his cousin Lucy. We are happy to add, also, another fact of importance. The worthy schoolmaster suffered so much in mind from his share of the misfortune, that he resolutely declined will-making in future. Let all like him avoid meddling with what they do not understand. It is not always that the mischiefs incident on such mistakes, are thus happily obviated.

HEALTHY CHILDREN.

"What makes the children in England so healthy and ruddy?"

"They are fed on good bread, bannocks and milk."

"Do they not give them any pies, hot cakes and preserves?" said Lizzie.

"No, child, except on special occasions, and then quite sparingly."

"I would not like to live there."

"Would you not like to have red cheeks, bright eyes, and blooming health?"

"O, yes! but what have these to do with cakes, pies and puddings?"

"Much every way," said auntie.

"Did you not feel a little feverish yesterday afternoon?"

"Yes, my head ached so bad, and my heart beat dreadfully, and I was so hot."

"So I thought. It was the pound-cake and brandy-peaches that did the mischief."

"But mother says I am so delicate, that I need something to help me."

"Yes, child, you need much to help you, but not in the way of such delicacies; these only make the matter worse."

"But I like them so much!"

"This is because you have pampered your appetite. Only try for a week plain, simple food, and you will like it better. Warm biscuit, mince-pies, doughnuts and hot coffee, would try the digestive organs of an anaconda. Boys who run in the open air, and play at foot-ball and take it roughly, may stand such diet; but girls wilt and waste away under it."—The Gem.

INGRATITUDE TO PARENTS.

There is a proverb that "a father can more easily maintain six children, than six children one father." Luther relates this story: There was once a father who gave up everything to his children—his house, his fields and goods—and expected for this his children would support him. But after he had been some time with his son, the latter grew tired of him, and said to him, "Father, I have had a son born to me this night, and there, where your arm chair stands, the cradle must come; will you not, perhaps, go to my brother, who has a large room?" After he had been some time with the second son, he also grew tired of him, and said, "Father, you like a warm room, and that hurts my head. Wont you go to my brother, the baker?" The father went, and after he had been some time with the third son, he also found him troublesome, and said to him, "Father, the people run in and out here all day, as if it were a pigeon-house, and you cannot have your noon-day sleep; would you not be better off at my sister Kate's near the town wall?" The old man remarked to himself how the wind blew, and said to himself, "Yes, I will do so; I will go and try it with my daughter. Women have softer hearts." But after he had spent some time with his daughter, she grew weary of him, and said she was always so fearful, when her father went to church or anywhere else, and was obliged to descend the steep stairs, and at her sister Elizabeth's there were no stairs to descend, as she lived on the ground floor. For the sake of peace the old man assented, and went to his other daughter. But after some time, she too was tired of him, and told him by a third person, that her house near the water was too damp for a man who suffered with gout, and her sister, the grave-digger's wife, at St. John's, had much drier lodgings. The old man himself thought she was right, and went outside the gate to his youngest daughter, Helen. But after he had been three days with her, her little son said to his grandfather, "Mother said yesterday to Cousin Elizabeth that there was no better chamber for you, than such a one as father digs." These words broke the old man's heart, so that he sank back in his chair and died.—The Home Educator.

A CLERICAL EXPERIENCE.

One of our contributors relates the following incident at a marriage service: "I was once called upon to marry a couple, who, to use the phrase of a New York editor, were 'as black as the ace of spades on a rainy midnight in a dark cellar.' After I got to the house, the bridegroom went out to get a witness for the ceremony. When he returned he brought two—a man and a large dog. At their entrance I was standing leaning against a mantel-piece, and two cats were upon the floor near me. At the sight of the dog one of the cats ran under a bed that was in the room, and the other ran up my back, between my coat and my vest, where I let her remain until the dog was put out, when I removed her." Of course the want of harmony between cats and dogs did not, on this festive occasion suggest any thoughts respecting what possibly might be the experience of the married couple.—Transcript.

YOUTH.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

Smoothly flowing through verdant vales,
Gentle river, thy current runs,
Sheltered safe from winter gales,
Shaded cool from summer suns.
Thus our youth's sweet moments glide,
Fenced with flowery shelter round;
No rude tempest wakes the tide,
All its path is fairy ground.

But, fair river, the day will come,
When, wooed by whispering groves in vain,
Thou 'lt leave those banks, thy shaded home,
To mingle with the stormy main.
And thou, sweet youth, too soon wilt pass
Into the world's unsheltered sea,
Where once thy wave hath mixed, alas,
All hope of peace is lost for thee!

ISADORE, THE IDEAL.

A REMINISCENCE OF PARIS.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

DURING my stay in the French metropolis—it was in 183—, I believe—much of my time was engrossed in visiting artistic exhibitions and galleries. One, in particular, in which I rarely missed passing an hour daily, was entirely a private collection, thrown open gratuitously to public inspection, by the generosity of the proprietor. This was the generally-received opinion; although the reader who follows me to the end of my sketch, will discover another and very different motive.

There could be but one opinion as to the taste of the owner of this collection; and that, that it was highly-cultivated. So fine a gallery of pictures, both of the old and new schools, and in every conceivable style of art, and upon such a happy diversity of subjects, is not of frequent occurrence, even in public institutions; and indeed the fact that these paintings should be private property, was an agreeable novelty to me. I became anxious to see the man to whom I had become indebted for so many past and prospective hours of pleasure; and expressing the wish to a friend with whom I was one day promenading, he replied:

“Well, mon ami, you may have that pleasure immediately. Monsieur Earnest Durant, to whom you refer, is at this moment seated in yonder cabriolet.”

I had thus a good opportunity to observe, without attracting attention, the individual whom I wished to see. I recognized him immediately, as one whom I had often noticed in his gallery, although of course unknown to me, as he must have been to the great majority of those who attended it. He was a person of perhaps thirty-five, handsome, agreeable when he chose to be, with great, dreamy eyes, profuse black hair, and a moustache which is exactly fac-similed in that of the present French emperor. What was more particularly noticeable about him, was his careless, not to say slovenly appearance, as well as the general abandon of his dress, and the unchangeable abstraction of his air. Yet he was evidently a man of wealth and education, as well as of luxurious habits, and therefore, in view of what I have just said concerning him, an anomaly. With deeply increased interest, as we passed on, I asked my friend for an explanation.

“Remind me to tell you about it some other time,” he said, in reply. “It’s too long a story for the street. Your own observation has probably shown you that he has some absorbing pursuit which engrosses his time and thoughts. This much everybody knows, although very few are conversant with the real cause of his melancholy habits.”

I, of course, promised myself the gratification of soon learning the history of M. Durant; but before an occasion had fairly offered for me to remind my friend of his promise, I had learned all that I wished to know, in a much more interesting way.

It so happened that upon the following morning, I dropped into the gallery to which I have alluded, intending to remain but a few moments. Quite a number were present notwithstanding the earliness of the hour; and as fate would have it, M. Durant came strolling in, with his usual careless gait, alone; and I at once determined to watch him. Nobody seemed to recognize him, and it was soon apparent that no person present was honored by his acquaintance. And it may be remarked here, that I say honored, because I mean it, speaking not at all frivolously. M. Durant walked slowly down the gallery, towards where I stood, and it was observable that he scrutinized the face of every lady as he passed; this, of course, not rudely, or in a manner at all marked, but respectfully, and in such a way that even the most fastidious could not have taken offence. Finally, after passing all the spectators, he took his stand very near me, and at once occupied himself with gazing at a picture. Approaching behind him, I immediately remembered to have seen him pause before no other painting than this, upon whatever occasion I might have seen him in the gallery; and I now examined the picture more attentively than I had yet done.

It was, in fact, a most exquisite production—the representation of a young girl, a brunette, black-haired, and with the most liquid, dreamy black eyes. The beauty of the features was of the most perfect model; but above this, the spectator was interested by the mysterious inner beauty, which was neither of one feature nor of another, but which looked out from the countenance as clearly as though the artist had produced the shadow of the soul itself in his work. It was, in short, just such a picture as an enthusiast might linger over for hours, and then leave unsatisfied.

Whether some comment, such as are made above, unconsciously dropped from my lips, I am unable to say; but M. Durant suddenly turned his head and discovered me at his back. There was a pleasant look upon his face as he pointed to the painting, and said, with an excellent English accent:

“You like it?”

“Exceedingly, monsieur,” was my reply.

“Give me your opinion of it in brief, if I may trouble you.”

“With pleasure. It is a beautiful piece of work, excellently finished. More than this, it is the triumph of fancy, a wonderful trick of the imagination, and the production of some person who must succeed just as often as he surrenders his will to his redundant ideality.”

“Ha! you talk like an artist; you are an acute critic! What if I should tell you that it is a portrait?”

“A portrait?” was my incredulous rejoinder, as I ran my eye over it again. “Impossible, monsieur; sitters are not so readily forthcoming for a portrait like this! We do not see faces like this in the street. I have not seen one since my arrival in the city, now some weeks past. No—it is not a portrait; I will wager what artistic reputation I have on the fact.”

My words seemed to create a sudden enthusiasm in M. Durant. Narrowly watching the expression of my face while I was speaking, when I had concluded, he grasped my hand cordially, exclaiming:

“Monsieur, I like you immensely. You are a person of quick discrimination and great taste! You have discovered at a glance, what I have been investigating for years, and am hardly assured of yet. Let us throw aside all ceremony. I am M. Ernest Durant, the proprietor of these galleries.

Returning the hearty pressure of his hand, I bowed and mentioned my name.

“An Englishman?”

“Not quite—but an American.”

“Ah—so much the better,” he replied, betraying an alacrity which seemed new to him. “You Americans are apt to be sympathetic and warm-hearted, and if I mistake not, I shall find an abundance of both qualities in you.”

Acknowledging the compliment, I observed that it must be a very fine thing to own so many fine pictures.

“It would to any other than myself,” he dejectedly replied. “But as for me, there is but one thing particularly desirable, and that, long experience has taught me is an impossibility. But, my dear monsieur, I have forced my acquaintance upon you so abruptly, because you have betrayed such an artistic taste, and have received my advances with such good-humored courtesy, that I feel sure of your sympathy and condolence with my misfortunes. Have I your permission to occupy your time for a very few moments—just long enough to make you acquainted with the story of this painting, as it is unhappily connected with my life?”

“As long as you please, monsieur—nothing would give me more pleasure.”

“Thanks—thanks. Well, then—here is a chair—pray be seated. We shall not be interrupted here.”

The morning hour of exhibition had, in fact, expired, and we were now alone in the gallery.

“To proceed,” M. Durant resumed, “my life, for the past ten years, has been a huge misery, an enormous anxiety. There is an expression which has become stereotyped on my lips. I repeat it every ten minutes. Let me give you a sample.”

Pressing his hands upon his sides, the speaker rolled up his eyes, drew down his visage till it had reached a Quixotic elongation, and in the most dismally doleful and lugubrious voice imaginable, sighed forth the words:

“Mon Dieu, how unfortunate!”

I was instantly convulsed with irresistible laughter, while Durant satisfied himself with a smile. It quickly occurred to me that I had heard precisely this phrase from him on several different occasions; although, of course, rendered with less exaggeration. When I could sufficiently control myself, I suggested that none but a Frenchman would ever find food for merriment in his own misfortunes.

“Perhaps not,” was his reply; “but it is certainly more humane than to gather it from the ills of others. However, it is a luxury which I do not often indulge in. But without further preliminaries, let me relate my story. It will necessarily be brief.”

“It is ten years this present summer, since Adolphe Regnault came to visit me and Paris.

His family resided at Lyons, and they had been for many years upon terms of close intimacy with mine. Latterly, however, this intimacy had subsided, from no particular cause, other than the distance between our respective places of residence; and it so happened that I had seen neither Adolphe nor his sisters, since we played together as children. I was heartily glad, therefore to see my friend, and for several days devoted myself closely to his pleasure—to say nothing of nights.

"One afternoon, while sitting together in the parlor of my hotel, Adolphe uttered a sudden exclamation, and ran up to his chamber. Returning in a moment, he brought with him a case, such as pictures are usually packed in.

"'Strange that I should be so forgetful,' he said. 'This, Ernest, is for you; my mother and sisters joined in sending it to you—although Isadore pouted a little about it.'

"'My sincere thanks. But why did the fair Isadore pout her beautiful lips, may I ask?'

"'You shall know in a moment.—Hang these nails—will they never come out? There, mon cher Ernest, what think you of that?'

"I had expected to see a rural landscape, done in a very rural style, by a rural artist; but imagine my surprise and gratification when this picture before us was produced. I recognized it as a gem from the hand of some master of his profession, and my expressions of thanks and gratification to Adolphe were profuse. Still, I had not the slightest idea that it was intended for anything more than a fancy sketch; and I jumped bolt upright, when Adolphe added to my praises;

"'Yes, it is all you say of it, and a most faithful copy of the original!'

"'Original!' I ejaculated. 'Adolphe Regnault, do you tell me that this is a portrait?'

"'I have not, as yet; but I do now. This picture, Ernest, is generally conceded to be a most lifelike representation of my sister Isadore!'

"'But are you not jesting, my dear fellow? I am not able to conceive how a woman can be so incomparably beautiful! There is some flattery of the artist, I suppose—some additions after the picture was finished, to give it a romantic effect.'

"'Allow me to say, Monsieur Ernest Durant, the romance is all in your own head,' Adolphe indignantly replied. 'I tell you now, a second time, that the portrait is Isadore herself, just as she is—and a lovelier woman you cannot find in France. Are you satisfied?'

"'Excuse my incredulity, my dear fellow; I am assured.' And for some minutes I continued to devour the picture with my eyes.

"'But I say, my dear Adolphe,' I cried, 'has Isadore any lovers?' I actually trembled for his answer.

"'Aha, my boy—trapped?' he smilingly observed. 'No, Ernest—none that she favors.'

"'Then I'll enter the lists myself! Don't smile—I was never more serious in my life. I tell you I am passionately in love with the original of that picture!'

"'Bravo!—I wish you success!' Adolphe replied, quite in earnest. 'And I don't know, Ernest, why you cannot win her. You shall return with me, and I promise you a fair field.'

"In my delirium of ecstasy I hugged Adolphe, called him my brother, and perpetrated a hundred other absurdities. Nor would my impatience permit me to wait until my proposed visit to Lyons, for the accomplishment of the great object which now lay next to my heart. My miniature was forwarded post-haste to Isadore Regnault, accompanied by an epistle, which, if it was not a declaration of love, was as certainly not a declaration of war. To madame, her mother, I also addressed the most respectful of letters, delicately reminding her of the pleasant intimacy which had subsisted between our families in times past, hinting at the strange and positively ridiculous fact, that this intimacy had never been more closely cemented by an intermarriage; and finally requesting her permission to me, to address Mademoiselle Isadore upon the subject of matrimony.

"You smile, my friend; but my conduct upon this occasion, only serves to illustrate the extravagant lengths to which men will go, when a woman happens to be in the case. I had no reason to complain, however, of the effect of my letters. From madame, I quickly received a very gracious reply, granting the permission asked, with evident satisfaction; while from Isadore herself, came a dainty epistle, filled with wit and sentiment such as really charmed me. It was doubly gratifying to ascertain that my idol was refined and educated; that the beauty of her face was matched by that of her mind. Other letters passed between us, until, to be brief, when Adolphe and myself were ready to start for Lyons, I was the accepted lover of the peerless Isadore Regnault!

"My heart was full to overflowing; my exaltation knew no bounds; reversing the wish of the Roman tyrant, I could have clasped the whole world in my fraternal embrace. During our journey, Adolphe was constantly employed in repressing the exuberance of my spirits; and I finally left the diligence at Lyons, with the air of a Cæsar. We were received with open arms by madame and her daughters—but Isadore was announced as absent, in the city, on a visit. She would return, however, in the evening. And until evening I was tortured every moment with the suspense. I could do nothing, be nothing, until I had seen the object of my affections; and as I so frankly declared, madame excused my abstraction and applauded my fidelity.

"Finally Isadore returned; and with a painfully palpitating heart, I was presented to her. My eyes had no sooner rested on her face, than I started back in anger and sickened disappointment.

"This Isadore Regnault—this? Juste ciel!"

"I must have pronounced the words loud enough to be heard by every person in the room; but in the desperation of my disappointment, I was utterly careless. Taking her hand, I actually held her from me and scrutinized her. There she stood, blushing in the vexation of maidenly modesty, a handsome brunette—and that was all! None of those bright shades of finer beauty which the treacherous artist had so cunningly employed; none of that deep soul-beauty which dreamed on the countenance of the pictured Isadore—all, all was delusion. And here was the woman who had been represented to me as the original of that wonder, that miracle of art! She, forsooth! Though undoubtedly beautiful, she bore the same relation to that work of art, as the unwrought marble bears to the delicately chiselled figure. It was a bitter, bitter disappointment—the more bitter since the blow was entirely unexpected. Mon Dieu, how unfortunate!"

I could have smiled at the words, though uttered in real misery, had it not been for the tears which trickled down his cheeks. Impatiently dashing them away, he continued:

"These tears proclaim my weakness; but they are not so many, nor so bitter as those I shed in my privacy that fatal night. Ah, it was fearful—to build up such an idol as I had built in my heart, only to have it thus rudely dashed down. It was like the breaking of the heart itself.

"But to resume. I made no efforts to conceal my real feelings; in a matter which touched my heart so deeply, I could practise no deception. Therefore, seizing my hat, I abruptly quitted the room and the mansion. I had no reason to suppose that I should hear no more of the affair, and in an hour Adolphe encountered me in the street, pale with fury, and with epithets none of the mildest, demanded an explanation. I endeavored to retain my composure, but the course of our colloquy rendered this impossible; and at last, losing all patience, I abruptly charged the presentation of the picture as an atrocious cheat, an artful deception, and other equally reprehensible asseverations. Language such as this could of course admit of but one settlement; and that was resorted to, with the assistance of small-swords and seconds, the next morning. To be brief, I inflicted an ugly puncture just beneath Adolphe's shoulder-blade, from which, in some miraculous manner, he managed to recover. Nevertheless, it consumed some six months, and threw the family into a terrible panic. Mon Dieu, it was immensely unfortunate, especially for him!

"Nothing remained for me, but to return to Paris; so I returned. Everything seemed distasteful to me, save my picture, and I often gazed upon it by the hour, until finally a happy idea visited my mind. Why should there not be an Isadore somewhere, of whom this should be the true representation? Was this artist's skill so wonderful, that he could conjure up an image more lovely than all the forms of loveliness which people this wide world? Obeying the impulse, I frequented public places; I haunted the streets, I travelled, but all to no purpose. Many beautiful faces I saw, but none to rival, none to compare with this! Weary of all this vain labor, I gathered the choicest of my paintings into these rooms, and opened them for free, public exhibition. I solemnly declare to you, my friend, that my sole motive in so doing, was to discover, if possible, among the crowds which daily flock here, the counterpart of this picture. What an extravagant idea—what a vain labor! I am at last beginning to think very much so. Pshaw! what faces do I see here daily! In fact, I think I am becoming skeptical upon the subject of human beauty. My standard is this picture, and all below it must be set down as spurious.

"Some months ago, I chanced to see, unobserved, Isadore among the spectators. Quantum mutatus ab illa! Imagine a portly dame of two hundred, avoirdupois, leaning on the arm of a man quite as gross-looking, and followed by four noisy children! I gave a sigh of relief, thanked the fates, ordered the servant to remove my darling picture until their departure—and prudently kept out of the way myself.

"But I must not conclude, without relating a most interesting incident which occurred to me the other day. You observe that the name of the artist is in the corner of the picture—Franz Kepler. Becoming lately aware of the presence in Paris of an artist of that name, I sent an invitation to him to visit my gallery, in company with myself. He gladly complied; and I found him to be a German, with a fine intellectual head, the true artist's eye, and a certain indescribable something in his tout ensemble, which assured me that I had discovered the painter of my picture; at least, I should have chosen him from a hundred to execute such a work. But to reduce the matter to certainty, we had no sooner entered the gallery, than I led him straight to the picture.

"Are you not the artist of this, monsieur?" I asked.

"He immediately recognized his work, and a moment later recalled the circumstances, the time, and the place of its execution. He was continuing to descant upon its merits, when I stopped him.

"Monsieur," I gravely observed, 'you, by this unhappy picture, have ruined me forever!'

"The astonished artist stared with wonder—and with my heart swelling with grief, I narrated to him what you have just heard. His sense of the ludicrous was several times evidently affected as I proceeded; but sympathizing with my unhappiness, he restrained his mirth. When I had finished, he frankly said:

"I see, monsieur, that you regard me as a skillful knave of the brush—a kind of quack in portraiture, who flatters with his colors those who are vain enough to be deceived. You do me injustice, monsieur. Had I a particle of such knavery in my composition, I would throw my palette and brushes into the Seine to-morrow, and forswear art forever. The truth is, monsieur, my ideality is so great, that it betrays me into extravagance whenever I take up a brush. I find it impossible to reduce myself to plain truth; it is so severe that my fancy will get the uppermost. And so, when a plain country dame comes for her portrait, I make her a paragon of beauty; when the proprietor of some dilapidated estate wishes a picture of his possessions, I astonish him with an Eden. Both are delighted, and I receive five times my usual charge. This is a fact, monsieur, and I pray you believe it. The fault is natural—inborn, and I can never hope to conquer it.'

"This statement, so frankly made, disarmed my hostility, and left me to communicate still further with the artist, upon the picture.

"Did you, M. Kepler," I said, 'ever meet with a human face as lovely as that you have delineated upon the canvass yonder?'

"In good sooth, I never did," he unhesitatingly replied, gazing upon the canvass.

"Do you think, M. Kepler, that there is in the world a face as beautiful as that?'

"My dear monsieur, vanity aside, and to speak candidly, I do not. Such faces, let me assure you, are born only in the brain, and exist only in the colors of Franz Kepler! Ah, no—they are sadly unreal! I have worshipped my own pictures more than you have ever worshipped this: and although I never sought their originals about the world, yet I think I should know what course to pursue, should I meet one of them at any time—the counterpart of this, for instance!'

"You would woo her for me, noble Kepler," I enthusiastically exclaimed. 'You would tell her of my devotion and of my romantic love, and—'

"Tush," laughed the artist. 'Yes, I should assuredly woo her, but it would as certainly be for myself!'

"Mon Dieu—how unfortunate!' was all that I could say.

"Thus, you see, my friend," Durant continued, "what have been my toils and struggles, my weariness of heart and mind, while pursuing this phantom—this ideal Isadore. And now you will ask, 'Do you really believe in the existence of the reality of what you so faithfully seek?' My friend, I sincerely do believe it—somewhere in this wide world my ideal Isadore, my glorious creation, is awaiting my coming! I must seek her until the day of my death—it is my destiny! Why not in America?'

"There are marvellously beautiful women in my native land, but I must confess, I find too much attraction in women of undoubted substance, to admit of my seeking after ideals!'

"Ah, you are skeptical! But perhaps I shall meet you in America in the course of a year or two. Adieu, for the present! Mon Dieu, how extremely unfortunate!" We parted with a cordial shake of the hand, and as it so happened that I was suddenly called away from Paris a few days later, and returned home without revisiting it, it also happened that my first and last meetings with M. Durant were identical. I never saw him again. The friend mentioned in the first portion of this veritable narrative, sent me, quite lately, a paper, containing a detailed account of M. Durant's death. During the long interval of years, between the date of my meeting with him, and that of his death, he had continued to haunt his picture-gallery, stubbornly intent on the same purpose, growing weak and pale as he grew older, until he could with difficulty totter about. When upon his death-bed, he ordered the picture which had been the source of his destruction, to be hung before him, and he actually died with his eyes rivetted upon it, and with the words upon his lips—" Mon Dieu, how unfortunate!"

NATURAL MELODY.

Harp of the winds! What music can compare With thy wild gush of melody?—or where Mid this world's discords may we hope to meet
Tones like to thine—so soothing and so sweet!

A REFRAIN.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

That sound—that sound—it comes afar
 From chambers of the past;
 No other song shall ever mar,
 Or to that strain a sweetness cast.
 Its single thrill of melody
 All down life's pathway shall bestow
 Haunts of the music said to be,
 Where chastened hearts no sorrows know.
 Its tender echoes strangely tell
 Of sinful thoughts all swept away;
 Of fresher tears, which gently fell,
 When with that sound came fresher day.

How may I speak enough the love
 Of Him who touched my wayward heart
 By tones akin to those above,
 A heavenward yearning to impart?
 How can enough my spirit soar,
 To seek a glimpse of joys beyond,
 Until from earth's bleak tempest-shore
 A saviour's hand shall break the bond?

MARY.

BY ALICE C. BENTON.

"Loop up this sleeve a little higher, Mary. Why do you lag so, child? The company will be here before I am half dressed. Why, you are crying, as I live! One would think you were half-envious of me. Never mind—some day you may be married, too. But, alas, poor girl, you will never have a Richard Angell!"

"God forbid that I should!" said the young girl, hastily, wiping away the drops that had gathered in her eyes.

"Nay, now you are too bad, Mary. It is a poor joke, if you mean it as such, and a wicked thing, if you do it to annoy and vex me."

"I do it for neither, Alice. I would not jest about it for the world; and God knows, my poor girl, you have vexation and disappointment in store, enough to make you old before your time. I will not add to the load, believe me."

"Ah, you have some foolish story in your head about Richard's taking a social glass at a wedding. He has explained all about it to me, and I am perfectly satisfied."

A tap at the door, and a rich, musical voice calling, "Alice, dear, are you almost ready?" stayed the answer that was rising to the sister's lips, and Alice ran to open the door. The figure that stood there, leaning against the doorpost, was one that might have captivated the imagination of a stronger minded woman than Alice Phillips. He was somewhat taller than the middle height, was of fair complexion, had bright, laughing blue eyes, and auburn hair which curled in tight, crisp rings close to a head which would have been beautiful as that of Antinous, had not the sensual characteristics predominated somewhat over the intellectual. To-night he is perfectly radiant with his new happiness and the delight of seeing Alice so very beautiful.

Richard's tendencies were all selfish. It was not so much that he cared to see beautiful women—but then, Alice was about to belong to him, and he loved to think of showing her in public. I am not sure that he would not have had a similar feeling in regard to a fine animal, were it his property. He had once offered his hand to Mary Phillips. She had heard of his love for wine, and, although she was certainly dazzled not a little by his exterior, and the worldly advantages of fortune and position which he possessed, yet her refusal was peremptory and decided. It was, therefore, with great pain that she saw him daily gaining ground with Alice, to whom he had lightly transferred his affections.

In vain she had represented to her father and mother that he was not a person with whom one so light and volatile as Alice should be trusted—that he was one with whom her happiness must surely be wrecked. They laughed at her fears, declared she was an envious old maid, and insisted that she should not spoil her sister's good luck by her croakings.

Misapprehended on every side, Mary had nothing but to fall back upon silence; yet, at the last moment, she did suffer another word to tell her strong disapprobation of Richard's habits, although she knew it was too late to alter her destiny. The foolish story to which Alice referred, was this:

Richard Angell, hitherto a sober youth, undicted to any of the excesses of the age, had been coaxed by a young bride to take wine at her wedding. It was contrary to his habits and his principles. The very selfishness that was inherent in his nature pointed away from this sin; but the fair bride prevailed. The wine was swallowed—and thenceforth Richard Angell never saw the red wine sparkling in the cup that he did not quaff it to the bottom.

When his father and mother went down to the grave, the hardest part of death to them was the thought that Richard was fast becoming a thing for scorn to point at; but still they had some faint hope that a good wife might come to the rescue, and save him from utter ruin. Had he married Mary Phillips, she might have done so; but for Alice—God pity her, though she wilfully shut her eyes to the coming destruction.

In vain Alice had entreated Mary to accompany them to town, where Richard had engaged a fine house, and had launched into great outlays for its furnishing and decorations. She firmly resisted, notwithstanding the childish complaint of Alice that "Mary could not bear to see anybody happy." Richard asked her; but she could see that he was not ungratified at her refusal. Perhaps he dreaded her lynx-eyed sagacity at discovering his little foibles.

A round of visiting brought them into contact with gay and fashionable people, with whom the glass was, as a matter of course, indispensable. As a matter of course, too, Richard prided himself upon fine wines, and seldom bought any but those that were expensive. Alice acquired a love for these costly luxuries, and headache and lassitude were her mornings' experiences. Soon it began to work on her beauty. Her delicate complexion grew coarse, and harsh lines settled in her once smooth forehead; while—it shocks us to speak it—but her nose actually blushed in imitation of the ruby tint which each day she allowed to pass her lips. Richard saw it all, but he held his peace, conscious that his own example and urging had brought on this change in his idol.

One year had passed away, in which Richard's outward affairs had but little changed. It takes some time to undermine a noble property so that the ravages become visible. It is not so with the person. That shows the slightest outrage which strong drink makes. To one of his sanguine complexion and temperament, it discovers itself quickly in the added color that spreads itself over and beyond the cheeks and extends to the throat and temples, and even to the roots of that hair so nearly bordering upon red as to be scarcely distinguishable from the red face. About this time Alice was ill, and sent for her mother to be with her. Mr. Phillips had been far from well and did not like to have her leave him. He suggested that Mary could better be spared from home; and Mary, fearing to worry and annoy her parents, decided upon going.

She arrived half an hour after Alice had given birth to a son. Richard was in high spirits, distributing wine in abundance to every person who had any place in his household, so that the servants were in the most amiable moods imaginable. Mary hastened to Alice, sick at heart of the sight and smell of liquors which stood in bottle array all over the house. Alice welcomed her, and she took her place as assistant nurse; for unhappily the principal was already overcome with the generous hospitality of the exultant father. When she went to tea, Richard's manner towards her was marked by an almost foolish familiarity, which she could not at once repel.

"You ought to have been that boy's mother, Mary," he said, as she poured his tea. "Alice is a good girl, but then, you know 'First love'—what is it, Mary? O, I know—'First love will with the heart remain' when it spells—spells—never mind," he continued, winking most offensively at her, "the worst has been your own. You might have been sitting opposite me as my wife instead of my sister—"

"Mr. Angell, you insult me. If you do not instantly cease, I will leave the table."

"No, indeed, Mary, you shall do no such thing," he answered, suddenly becoming sober at her visible anger. "I did not mean anything; but I am so elated with the coming of my boy, and so happy at Alice's being so much better than I apprehended, that you must excuse my levity."

"I am quite ready to do so, Richard," she rejoined, more gently, "but let me beg you not to resort to anything that will induce artificial spirits, since you seem already to be sufficiently elevated."

"Bless your soul, Mary, I am the most temperate man living! I have often laughed at your refusal of me for indulging in a glass of wine. Now, I assure you, I do not care for it in the least."

Mary was displeased at this statement, knowing it to be false, and escaped as soon as possible to her sister's chamber, where she found the old nurse asleep in the great chair, with the baby just dropping from her arms. She caught the child, but turned away her head as the strong odor of spirits came from the little one.

"Good heavens!" she exclaimed, "has this woman been dragging this child?"

"Pooh, Mary!" said Alice, who had seen nothing of the state of either child or nurse, "baby was in pain, and nurse gave it some cordial. Don't be a fool!"

"But look at the woman herself, Alice."

"O well, I dare say she was up with some sick person last night, and this warm room has made her sleepy."

Mary made no answer, but she inwardly resolved to watch and if possible, to prevent the little creature from being drugged again. Her scrutiny offended the nurse, and she said to Alice:

"I shall feel obliged to go away, ma'am, if Miss Phillips chooses to stay here. Her and me is so different in taking care of childr'n."

Alice was terrified, and begged the two, separately, to give way to each other's fancies about the child. But the nurse declared she would not stay to be watched, and accordingly took her leave. Mary walked miles to find another nurse, and succeeded in obtaining a mild, gentle-looking woman, whose judicious management of the child recommended her even to Richard himself.

The next three years made it quite visible that things were going behindhand with the Angells. Alice had now four children, two of whom were twins. She took no care of her household, and Mary, when she visited her, which she did for the children's sake, was grieved to see her falling into a low-spirited, miserable way that required constant stimulants to overcome temporarily. Richard was reduced to the condition of an actual drunkard. He was cross, morose and ill-tempered in the morning; foolish and maudlin at noon, and sunk into utter insensibility at night. Mary persuaded Alice to go home and visit their old father and mother, who now felt keenly their own share in this unhappy marriage. Alice complied, to change the scene, as she said, but really to get rid of her husband. The love that had seemed so warm, had faded into mere indifference. Her feelings were not strong enough for hate.

When she returned to his house, Mary begged to keep little Richard. He was now old enough to know what his father's habits were, and Mary dreaded the contagion. Alice gladly consented; for her troop of lazy, ill managed servants were not fit to take care of children. Her husband ridiculed her when she returned without the boy, and let fall some offensive expressions about the "old maid." But he had not spirit enough to recall him.

The wreck of a fine property was, at length, all that was left to the miserable family, and Mr. Phillips was obliged to take them all home. The tribe of idle servants was discharged; the house and grounds, which were found to be deeply mortgaged, were let in order to pay off the interest, and there was nothing else left. Richard Angell scoffed at the narrow economy which the Phillips were absolutely obliged to practise, now that they were so heavily burdened with his family—and he was a prey to ill-temper because his stimulants were so wholly cut off. Everything was done to rouse him into action; but it required some great shock to waken him from his contemptible indolence. It came to him at last—that terrible shock which would have had effect upon one not so sunken as himself. The cholera of 1832 had made ravages in almost every home, and that of Mr. Phillips was not exempted. Alice and the twins were taken first. He saw them die—and the next hour he was helplessly intoxicated with the stimulants that had been used to allay their sufferings. Alternately weeping at his loss and clamoring for wine and brandy to cure the sickness which he declared was already upon him, he fell into a state which precluded his attendance at the funeral. It was with difficulty that they made him understand that Alice was dead, although he had been conscious of it at the time.

Mary was all that a mother could be to his children—more than Alice ever could have been. For their sakes she bore with their father; and when at last the body which he had so wronged and outraged with strong drink, was sinking into its last slumber, she had her reward in knowing that he was sensible of her kindness and repented of his worse than useless life.

Little Richard is a man now—a good, upright, honest and temperate man. He knows that he owes it to his Aunt Mary that he is so; and the tender care that he bestows on her old age is beautiful to behold. As she sits and gazes upon him from the recesses of her easy chair, she thinks that so might his father have become, had his childhood been so watched as Richard's had been. And, as she cherishes that thought, her remembrance of the elder Richard grows more tender and forgiving, for he is now in the hands of Him who judges human frailty and imperfection in a different way perhaps from mortals.

A SWISS PENALTY.

In some parts of Switzerland, singular judicial penalties are still in force. A few days ago, one Hug, of Stanz, was convicted by the tribunal of Unterwald, for having, while in a state of intoxication in a public house, employed offensive language respecting the Pope, and he was condemned to twenty blows with a stick, to be administered in private, a fortnight's imprisonment in the hospital, a week's retirement to be passed in religious exercises in the monastery of the Capuchins, to occupy a separate place at church for the space of two years, and during that time to attend morning and evening service and the class of catechism, to be deprived for an indefinite period of his civil rights, and finally to pay all the costs.—Paris Moniteur.

GRAVES AT SEBASTOPOL.

It appears by a letter of Mr. Gowen, the American engineer, who is engaged in raising the sunken Russian vessels in the harbor of Sebastopol, that the graveyards of the allies number three hundred, and that they cover twenty square miles of territory. Considering that the siege lasted less than two years, and that these graves comprise the dead of but one side, such a war, if continued, would in time have decimated the nations engaged.—New York Express.

The Florist.

Out at sea the island wooded,
Silver birches golden-hooded,
Set with maples crimson-blooded,
White sea-foam and sand-hills gray,
Stretch away, far away,
Dim and dreary, over-brooded
By the hazy autumn day.—J. G. WHITTIER.

Lawns and Gravel-Walks.

The grass-plot and lawns in gardens generally have a melancholy appearance at this time of the year. In some places they are rough with wormeats, and in others bare from the shade of trees, or the constant passing of feet. Laying down fresh sods is the usual remedy, but it is very troublesome, and oftentimes affords only a temporary relief. The best way of renovating a grass-plot is, therefore, not to lay down fresh sods, but to sow a few seeds; and to render these more effectual, the surface should be scratched over with an iron rake before the seeds are sown, and rolled afterwards. Dutch clover, and what are called mixed grass seeds, are best; and the thinner the seeds are sown so as to cover the ground, the more likely they are to come up. When dug ground is to be sown with grass seeds, so as to make a grass-plot without laying down sods, the proportion may be about five bushels to the acre. Gravel-walks at this season are also apt to look poor and neglected, and they should be either relaid entirely with fresh gravel, or they may be stirred, and a thin layer of gravel laid on top, and afterwards firmly rolled. When the gravel is loose, it ought to be mixed with gravel of an adhesive nature.

Roses.

Roses are such general favorites, that a few remarks may be acceptable. There are many roses which, if carefully removed from the borders, will continue to bloom all the winter with very little trouble. The crimson and blush China rose, the Crimson Perpetual, or Rose du Roi, are all very beautiful profuse bloomers, and of a neat, compact habit of growth. There are some roses which seem especially adapted for pot-culture, from their graceful, neat form and persistent blooming—almost all the monthly roses have that reputation. The soil for roses should be two-thirds loam from rotted turf and one-third cow-mazure, or the soil from an old hotbed; and the size of the pot should be dependent upon the root, which may be trimmed a little, but not much.

Hoya Carnosa.

A fine thick-leaved climbing plant, bearing many bunches of small star-formed blossoms. Grow in a compost of one part loam, two parts peat, and one part dung. Shift from time to time, and support the plant as it grows. It trains well up a rafter, or on a wall; and if healthy and luxuriant, will have from thirty to forty blossoms upon it at a time. Cuttings can be struck, and even its thick leaves.

Gloxinia.

These plants are remarkable for their splendid leaves, which are like so many shades of green velvet. They die down after blooming, and rest all the winter; in the spring shake out all the old soil, and re-pot them in rich loam. Keep them near the light, but be careful to shade the flowers from the sun. These plants will soon be covered with beautiful flowers in great profusion.

Hyacinths and Narcissus in Pots.

Hyacinths, polyanthus and jonquils make a beautiful appearance during the winter in the house. Bulbs intended for blooming in the winter should be potted in October or November, and left out until it begins to freeze, and then placed in a warm room. They will want occasionally a little water until they begin to grow; then they should have both air and sun, and plenty of water from the saucers or pans beneath the pots. Those bulbs, as hyacinths, etc., which are designed to flower in glasses, should be placed in them towards the end of November, the glasses being first filled with rain-water, so that the bulbs may come in contact with it. Then put them in a dark place for a few days, to promote the shooting of roots, after which they are to be exposed to the air and sun. The water must be changed as often as it becomes impure, and never be allowed to freeze.

Skill of Japanese Gardeners.

The botany of the island of Japan is more varied than that of any country of the same area, as it comprises the flora of the tropics and of the antarctic regions. The Japanese possess the art of dwarfing and of magnifying vegetable products in an extraordinary manner. A recent traveller states that he saw a plum tree, a cherry tree and a fig tree growing in a small box, not more than six inches long, the plum tree being in blossom; while, on the other hand, cabbages are grown of such a size, that one is much as a man can lift. The Japanese horticulturists also have the power of concentrating the vigor of a fruit-tree in a single branch, which will thus bear blossoms and fruit much greater than the common size.

Pompones Crysanthemums.

The miniature or daisy flowered crysanthemums are yearly becoming greater favorites both in the garden and for the house, and we are glad of it. We hope the taste for them will continue to extend. For pot culture the pompones are considered superior to any other kinds yet introduced, and are easily propagated. Strong healthy cuttings should be used, placing each cutting singly in a pot. The pots should be kept warm and moist. When well rooted they may be given more sun and air, and be re-potted into four-inch pots and treated as before, keeping them rather close for ten days; this will promote their growth very materially. When well rooted they should be shifted for the last time into a larger pot.

Polygala.

Common greenhouse plants, of which we should not care to have more than one. They require only common greenhouse treatment; but to prevent its being bushy, the plant must be checked while young, and the checking must be persevered in for some time. The flowers are purple and abundant.

Sensitive Plant.

This, though a native of the East and West Indies, and South America, is often successfully cultivated in New England. There are several species. The flowers are pale purple, contracting at night, and also when touched by the hand.

Faxonia Pannatistipula.

A plant nearly allied to the passiflora, and blooming very much like one. The plant will only do well trained to rafters; in fact, it is fit only for a conservatory.

The Housewife.

Tooth-Powders.

Prepared chalk, finely levigated, three drachms; Spanish soap, one drachm; Florentine iris root, one drachm; carbonate of soda, one drachm. If the teeth are constantly brushed once or twice a day with this powder, they are kept free from tartar.—2. Powder of Krameria, two drachms; myrrh, in powder, one drachm; camphor, four drachms; charcoal, one ounce; spirit of wine, ten minims. Rub the whole into a fine powder.—3. Red bark and Armenian bole, of each half an ounce; powdered cinnamon and bicarbonate of soda, of each, quarter of an ounce; oil of cinnamon, one or two drops; all in fine powder; mix.

Apple Jelly.

Cut in quarters six dozen good apples, take out all the cores, put them in a pan, just cover them with cold water and place them on the fire. Let them boil until quite soft, then drain upon a sieve, catching the liquor in a basin, which passes through a clean jelly bag; weigh out one pound of sugar to every pint of liquor; boil the sugar separately until it is almost candy, then mix the liquor with it, and boil, keeping it skimmed until the jelly falls from the skimmer in thin sheets; then take it from the fire, put it into small jars, and let it stand a day until quite cold, then put paper over and put by till wanted.

Compote of Peach.

Pare half a dozen ripe peaches, and stew them very softly from eighteen to twenty minutes, keeping them often turned in a light syrup, made with five ounces of sugar and half a pint of water boiled together for ten minutes. Dish the fruit; reduce the syrup by quick boiling, pour it over the peaches, and serve them hot for a second dish, or cold, for dessert. They should be quite ripe, and will be found delicious dressed thus. A little lemon-juice may be added to the syrup, and the blanched kernels of two or three peach or apricot stones.

Hop Ale.

Three quarters of a pound of the best hops to ten gallons of water, and one pound of white sugar to each gallon, boiled together for half an hour; then run it through a sieve into an open tub, to work for three, four, or five days, a little barm being put to it as soon as cool; put the clear liquor into a barrel, and bung it up; in a fortnight it will be ready to drink; in a week after put a few of the spent hops to float at the top of the barrel, when it is to be stopped up.

How to clean old Silver Coins.

Take four ounces of polishers' putty, four ounces of burnt hartshorn, and eight ounces of prepared chalk; mix them well together, and with this composition rub the coins, and in a short time they will become, to all appearance, equal to new. Or, wash them well with soap and water and a soft nail-brush; when dry, rub them with wash leather, or a soft brush used for cleaning plate, but not too roughly, or they may be injured.

How to detect Chalk in Milk.

Dilute the milk with water, and set it aside for a few hours; the chalk, if there be any, will be found precipitated to the bottom, which may be sufficiently identified by its appearance and its effervescing with an acid.

Dried Herbs.

All herbs which are to be dried should be washed, separated and carefully picked over, then spread on coarse paper, and kept in a room until perfectly dry. Those which are intended for cooking should be stripped from the stems and rubbed very fine; then put them in bottles, and cork tightly. Put those which are intended for medicinal purposes into paper bags, and keep them in a dry place.

Cherry Marmalade.

Remove the stones and stalks from the cherries, and rub the cherries through a sieve; add to this result a little currant juice, say half a pint to every three pounds of cherry; put the whole over the fire, stirring into it three-quarters of a pound of fine white sugar to every pound of the fruit, and boil it until it becomes a thick jelly; pour it into jars or moulds.

Hoarseness.

Take one drachm of freshly-scraped horseradish root, to be infused with four ounces of water in a close vessel for two hours, and made into a syrup with double its quantity of vinegar. It is an improved remedy for hoarseness; a teaspoonful has often proved effectual. A few teaspoonfuls, it is said, have never been known to fail in removing hoarseness.

Bitters.

Take half an ounce of the yolk of fresh eggs, carefully separated from the white, half an ounce of gentian root, one and a half drachm of Seville orange peel, and one pint of boiling water. Pour the water hot upon the above ingredients, and let them steep in it for two hours; then strain, and bottle for use.

Italian Lemonade.

Pare and press two dozen lemons, pour the juice on the peels, and let it remain on them all night; in the morning add two pounds of loaf sugar, a quart of good sherry, and three quarts of boiling water. Mix well, add a quart of boiling milk, and strain it through a jelly-bag till clear.

To detect Copper in Pickles or Green Tea.

Put a few leaves of the tea, or some of the pickle, cut small, into a phial with two or three drachms of liquid ammonia, diluted with one half the quantity of water. Shake the phial, when, if the most minute portion of copper be present, the liquid will assume a fine blue color.

Bites and Stings.

Apply instantly with a soft rag, moist freely, spirits of hartshorn. The venom of stings being an acid, the alkali nullifies them. Fresh wood ashes, moistened with water, and made into a poultice, frequently renewed, is an excellent substitute, or soda or saleratus, all being alkalies.

To seal Preserves.

Beat the white of an egg; take good white paper, tissue is best, cut it the size you require, and dip it in the egg, wetting both sides. Cover your jars or tumblers, carefully pressing down the edges of the paper. When dry, it will be as tight as a drumhead.

To destroy Worms in Garden Walks.

Pour into the worm-holes a strong lye made of wood-ashes, lime and water. Or, if more convenient, use for this purpose strong salt and water.

Roses.

Put some powdered charcoal around the roots of your roses. It will improve their color.

Tomato Catsup.

As the time is here for enjoying this favorite sauce, the following is a very good receipt for preparing it for future table use:—To half a bushel of skinned tomatoes add one quart of good vinegar, one pound of salt, a quarter of a pound of black pepper, two ounces of African cayenne, a quarter of a pound of allspice, six good onions, one ounce of cloves, and two pounds of brown sugar. Boil this mass for three hours, constantly stirring it to keep it from burning. When cool, strain it through a fine sieve or coarse cloth, and bottle it for use. Many persons omit the vinegar in this preparation.

To make Grease Balls.

Shave down half a pound of white soap, and mix it with three ounces of fullers' earth powdered; then mix together three ounces of ox-gall and two ounces of spirits of turpentine; with this moisten the soap and fullers' earth till you have a stiff paste. Mix it thoroughly, and beat it well. Make it into balls with your hands, and place the balls where they will dry slowly. To use it, scrape down a sufficiency, and spread it on the grease spot. Let it rest awhile; then brush it off, and scrape and apply some more. A few applications will generally remove the grease.

A good Blackberry Wine,

To make a wine equal in value to port take ripe blackberries, press the juice from them, let it stand thirty-six hours to ferment (lightly covered), and skim off whatever rises to the top; then to every gallon of the juice add one quart of water and three pounds of sugar (brown will do); let it stand in an open vessel for twenty-four hours; skim and strain it, then barrel it. Let it stand eight or nine months, when it should be racked off, and bottled and corked close; age improves it.

Ginger Lemonade.

Boil twelve pounds and a half of lump sugar for twenty minutes in ten gallons of water; clear it with the whites of six eggs. Bruise half a pound of common ginger, boil with the liquor, and then pour it upon ten lemons pared. When quite cold put it in a cask, with two table-spoonsful of yeast, the lemons sliced, and half an ounce of isinglass. Bung up the cask the next day; it will be ready in two weeks.

Snake Bites.

Turpentine is said to be a sure cure for the bite of a snake. It should be put in a bottle, and the mouth being placed over the spot, the liquid brought directly in contact with the wound by inverting the bottle, which should be held there until relief is obtained. A complete alleviation of pain has been known to ensue in less than a quarter of an hour. An important discovery.

Stye on the Eyelid.

Put a teaspoonful of tea in a small bag; pour on it just enough boiling water to moisten it; then put it on the eye pretty warm. Keep it on all night, and in the morning the stye will most likely be gone; if not, a second application is sure to remove it.

Cup Cakes.

Take twelve eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately, two cups of butter, four of sugar, one of sour milk, one teaspoonful of soda, five cups of flour; season with anything you choose, and bake in a slow oven.

Boiling Potatoes.

Let the potatoes lie in cold water six or eight hours before boiling—twelve hours for very old ones is not too long. Then put them into boiling water a little salted, and the water should be kept at a moderate boll till they are done, which should be tested with a fork; then pour off the water, and let them stand in the pot till dry. Great care should be taken not to let them cool a moment after they are done, as it will render them watery. An excellent plan to make potatoes mealy, is to turn them into a cloth and slightly press them. The large potatoes should be put into the pot before smaller ones, that they may be equally done. It requires from forty to fifty minutes. New ones will take about half that time.

Home-made Buns.

One and one-fourth cup of sugar, one-half pint of new milk, one cup of yeast, one-half cup of butter, add flour enough to make a thin batter, and let it rise. When sufficiently raised, add fruit, a tablespoonful of lemon or rose-water, with flour enough to mix into a firm dough. Cut into rounds, place in pans, and when again raised, it is ready for baking. Soon after they are taken from the oven the tops should be moistened with a little milk and molasses.

Relief for a Sprained Ankle.

Wash the ankle very frequently with cold salt and water, which is far better than warm vinegar, or decoctions of herbs. Keep your foot as cool as possible to prevent inflammation, and sit with it elevated on a high cushion. Live on very low diet, and take every day some cooling medicine—for instance, Epsom salts. By observing these directions only, a sprained ankle has been cured in a few days.

Seed of small Fruit.

Save the seeds of the small fruits—strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, etc.—as they ripen, and sow them so as to produce new and superior varieties. If you wish to produce earlier kinds, save seeds that ripen first; if late kinds, those that ripen later. It is probable that fruit adapted to all localities can be best originated in the places designed for them.

To get rid of Mosquitoes.

Mosquitoes, says somebody, love beef blood better than they do any that flows in the veins of human kind. Just put a couple of generous pieces on plates near your bed at night, and you will sleep untroubled by these pests. In the morning you will find them full and stupid with the beef blood, and the meat sucked as dry as a cork.

Useful Receipt.

The Scientific American advises the ladies, when they wish to wash fine and elegant colors, to boil some bran in rain water, and use the liquid cold. Nothing, it is said, can equal it for cleaning cloth, and for revivifying effects upon colors. Try it, ladies.

Chloric Ether.

Chloric ether is made by mixing one part of chloroform with six parts of rectified alcoholic spirits. It is excellent for outward applications in neuralgia and toothache.

A good Baking-Powder.

A good baking-powder is composed of nine ounces of bicarbonate of soda, eight ounces of tartaric acid, and ten ounces of rice or fine wheat flour.

Curious Matters.

Singular Preservation of a Child.

The late English papers tell a story of a remarkable character, to the following effect:—In one of the interior towns of England two gentlemen, on an exploring expedition, were peering down a well, said to be a hundred feet deep, when one of them distinguished the voice of a child in distress. After satisfying themselves that there was indeed some one in the well, they procured aid, and a boy, stimulated by the promise of a handsome reward, consented to descend, and was lowered to the bottom. He found there a living child of a few months old, who was brought to the surface, and found not to be seriously injured, though nearly famished for want of food. A young woman of the neighborhood is suspected of having lowered this child by a cord to the bottom of the well, and left it there to perish. It is thought that it had been there for nearly two days when it was discovered.

A Church-going Dog.

They boast of a remarkable dog down in Alabama. He is a small dog, but for three years, with only three or four exceptions, rain or shine, hot or cold, with company or without, he has not failed to attend divine service every Sabbath at the neighboring church. He seems to know instinctively when the time comes. It happened once that the dog had gone in the early part of the week to spend a few days at a house some miles from home. When Saturday evening came, however, he went home, and as usual on the next morning presented himself at church. It makes no difference whether any of the family go to church or not, he is always at his post. Moreover, when there he behaves himself as a good dog should. He stations himself near the door, and if any profane hog or cow comes rambling too near, he as noiselessly as possible drives them away.

An anxious Applicant.

Recently a gentleman rushed into the police office in London, in great perturbation of spirits, desiring the aid of a detective in recovering two bank notes, one of £100, and one of £30. He stated, that while standing at the counter of a bank, they were snatched from before him, and that he could form no opinion as to whom the robber was. He was confident, however, that the notes must have been taken from his hand. Just as he was leaving the office, in a rather dejected state of mind, one of the officers saw that he carried an umbrella, and asked him if he had looked inside that. The victim of the robbery laughed in derision, but concluded to look, and there the money was indeed found. The heart of the finder grew light, and he rewarded the astute official with £5 of the recovered treasure.

A curious old Cannon.

The citizens of Brockport, Ill., have clubbed their funds and purchased an old cannon to be used for firing salutes on public occasions, and by political parties to celebrate their victories. The Brockport Republican gives its history:—It was cast at a government arsenal of Prussia at Berlin; was taken from the Prussians by the English during a battle in the year 1778; was subsequently taken from the English by the Americans during the war of 1812. It is 10½ feet long, has a 4½ inch bore, carries a 12 pound ball, and requires 2½ pounds of powder to charge it to its proper capacity. The gun weighs over 2000 pounds, aside from the carriage, which weighs as much more.

Strange Accident.

A very singular accident, anatomically considered, occurred lately in Otsego county, New York. A little child five or six years old, while at play, fell in such manner as to strike the larynx, or upper part of the windpipe, upon the upper edge of the rocker of a small chair with such force as to break through the larynx, though the skin was not wounded; and although she did not at first seem much hurt, yet she began to cry, and the air came rushing out with fearful rapidity—and as there was no external opening, it passed into the cellular texture and was driven on under the skin, obliterating every natural feature of her countenance, closing her eyes, elevating the scalp, and then passing down, nearly surrounded the chest and upper abdominal integuments. Relief, however, was eventually afforded by physicians, and the child is now out of danger.

Singular Precocity.

In 1791 a child was born at Lubeck named Henri Heinekem, whose precocity was miraculous. At ten months of age he spoke distinctly, at twelve learnt the Pentateuch by rote, and at fourteen months was perfectly acquainted with the Old and New Testament. At two years of age he was as familiar with ancient history as the most erudite authors of antiquity. Sanson and Danville only could compete with him in geographical knowledge; Cicero would have thought him an "alter ego," on hearing him converse in Latin; and in the modern languages he was equally proficient. This wonderful child was unfortunately carried off in his fourth year. According to a popular proverb, "the sword wore out the sheath."

A Monomaniac.

A few weeks ago an eccentric old man died in Cleveland, and upon his deathbed he told his son-in-law, a resident of Erie, that in a certain place on Scranton's Flats a large sum of money was buried. He minutely described the spot, but did not tell who buried the treasure, or why it was buried. The son-in-law, at last accounts, has been digging for the money for several nights, assisted by several able-bodied men. He has found no money yet, but is sanguine of success, and will continue to dig. His friends regard him as an eligible candidate for some retired lunatic asylum, but he does not heed them. He says the old man would have told who buried the money had he lived a few moments longer, and feels confident that he will yet recover it.

Ornithological Curiosity.

A Rosen Journal relates a curious incident—One of the inhabitants of Sainneville, near that city, possesses a large cat, which for some time was in the habit of attacking the nests of swallows beneath the cornice, and devouring the birds. A few days ago she was basking in the sun in the open air, when a number of swallows, uttering piercing cries, attacked her, striking her with their beaks. The cat at first endeavored to catch some of them, but failed, and at last was forced to retreat, so violent was the attack of her irritated assailants.

Singular Cause of Death.

A young boy died in Newburyport a few days since from internal inflammation, and a post mortem examination proved that he had swallowed the hull of an rat or some grain, which, lodging in the intestines, had gathered matter and caused death. But a short time before he had swallowed a cent, from which no injury resulted.

A Convention of Toads.

A gentleman who observed the right states, that about ten days ago, along one of the main roads near Forge Village, in Westford, Conn., he observed the most marvelous collection of toads he ever witnessed or heard of. In the road, for as many as a hundred rods, the ground was so covered with them that one could not put his hand down without putting it upon a toad. An estimate was made, and it determined that there were at least as many as twelve toads to the square foot. The sides of the road and field were not examined, but for the distance we have named there were toads innumerable. Another fact not a little singular is, that they were all apparently the same size—being about half an inch high, or in length, and in color and appearance seemed to be precisely alike, and all were sprightly, and seemed as if very much at home. The question is, where did they come from?

Curious.

The discovery of a "perfect mine of antique art treasures" in some mounds outside the old Armeno-Assyrian city of Van is described in several of our foreign exchanges. A couple of pea-ants were engaged in digging out some loose stones from the mounds in question, when they came, first upon one, and then a second bronze plate, thickly embossed with cuneiform inscriptions, interspersed with rude, angular figures of men and animals. The pasha then despatched a party of explorers to the mounds, and the result of a few days' search was the discovery of a splendid bronze human-headed bull, about three-quarters life size, a large winged eagle, and two elaborately carved serpents, all in the purest bronze.

Mathematical Prodigy.

They have a mathematical wonder at San Francisco, in the person of a gardener employed by a gentleman of that city. Without having enjoyed any of the ordinary advantages of education, he is able, with scarcely a moment's reflection, to answer correctly difficult problems extending into the most distant calculations. Take, for instance, a given sum, say $1369; require the interest compounded for seventy-nine years, at 8-7-8 per cent. per month. He will immediately give the answer, and slower computers will find, after elaborate figuring, that he is absolutely correct. The ordinary results of multiplication, subtraction and division, he attains by intuition, no matter how complicated the sum.

Curious Violation of Law.

The Tribunal of Soissons, in France, has just condemned a farmer of Acy, near that town, for a singular offence against the game laws. It appears that recently the man, when rolling a field, found a hare caught by the roller, and picked it up in the presence of several persons. Afterward, thinking he had infringed the law, he threw the hare into a field. The tribunal decided that the offence of illegally killing game was proved, and condemned the man to pay a fine of fifty francs.

Singular Will.

A person of Florence, just deceased, has left a singular will. It declares that the greater part of his fortune shall go to the man with the largest hump on his back in all Tuscany, and the persons entrusted with selecting him shall be twelve hunchbacks! To compensate the latter for their trouble, he directs that, in addition to travelling expenses, each shall be presented with a gold medal bearing the effigy of Æeop, their prototype.

Singular Case.

Thirteen years ago a Mr. Whitehead, now of Clinton, O. W., but then living in Scotland, had the misfortune to run a needle into his heel, which broke, leaving the point-half so firmly fixed therein as to baffle the efforts of a physician to withdraw it. He continued lame for some time, but eventually all pain left him, and he felt no inconvenience from the intruder until last month, when he experienced a sharp pain in his side under the arm-pit, which so annoyed him, that he had the spot examined by Mrs. W., who, after a little effort, succeeded in dislodging with her unaided fingers the identical piece of needle which had so baffled the doctor, armed and aided as he was with his probes and lances, so many years before.

Not Inquisitive.

The Paris (Ky.) Citizen has found a woman who is not inquisitive. She has not seen the market-house for thirty-five years, although she lives within two squares of it; and she has never seen the railroad, and has no curiosity to see it. She says she did get a glimpse of the cars once from the street in front of her house as they passed over the bridge, but she "paid no attention to them." She has not been to church for forty years, and the reason she gives is, that people now-a-days go to church to look at each other's fine clothes and show their own, whereas when she was young they went there to pray and hear preaching.

A queer Nobleman.

There lately died at Milan a nobleman named Caldevara, who left his whole fortune, amounting to six millions of francs, as a legacy to the principal hospital at Milan. His favorite maxim was evidently a reversal of the old adage, "A fat kitchen makes a lean will;" for his sole food had for many years consisted of half-starved rabbits. About a hundred of these animals were discovered running wild about the house in which he died.

An odd Lawsuit.

A novel suit has been brought in Casnovia, Michigan, against a resident for obstructing the plaintiff's view of Casnovia Lake, by planting willow trees on the shore of the lake. The defendant's residence is on the lake shore, and he has built out into the natural waters by filling in with earth and planting rees, which the plaintiff contends he has no right to do. Much interest is felt in the result.

Learned Dog.

"Leo," a favorite Newfoundland dog, owned by Cyrus Robinson & Sons, of East Concord, N. H., died a few days since. His acquiring powers were of an order seldom found in the canine race, and his death seems worthy of mention. He would go, day after day, about one-third of a mile, and return with a pail of milk, with more regularity and faithfulness than many boys; also go to and from the post-office with letters, and perform many other similar services.

Remarkable Family.

According to the census returns, says the New Bedford Mercury, there is now residing in the north part of the city a family consisting of fourteen persons. The father of the family is 46 years of age, the mother 41, and their twelve children, all of the same parentage, are from 1 to 21 years of age, all of them remarkable for their quick intelligence. There has been no death nor sickness in the family.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

PRESENTIMENT.

A strange case of presentiment is recorded at Cambridge Valley, N. Y., by the Register of that place, as having recently occurred. A little boy of thirteen, son of Mr. Calver, had made arrangements to attend a balloon ascension at Saratoga, but his mother, having dreamed that her little son had suddenly died, had fears that he might meet with some accident in the crowd, and would not permit his attendance. By way of compensation, she permitted him to go berrying in the fields with some other children. He fell into a pond before his return, the same afternoon, and was drowned! How strongly this recalls to mind Leigh Hunt's poem of "The Inevitable," in which a man, afraid of death in a particular locality, wishes Solomon, the "Lord of the Magic Ring," to send him, by his magic power, elsewhere. He does so, and the man is killed in the removal. Shelley has an idea, too, of a soldier in battle, standing in a particular spot, seeing a shell approaching, springing six feet away to escape it, and landing in the very spot where one of the fragments of the shell strikes and blows him to pieces. Scott tells a story of a fisherman of whom it was predicted that he would be drowned on a certain day. His wife kept him at home, but he was taken with a fit and drowned by falling forward with his face in a basin of water in which he was washing.

IMPORTANT, IF TRUE.—A bald-headed gentleman in England has realized a beautiful crop of down, which bids fair to become hair, if it continues to grow, from the application of plaster of Paris, for the purpose of taking a cast of his features. The artist, a well-known maker of busts, vouches for the fact.

A BISHOP IN A FIX.

An Episcopal bishop, well known and well beloved in New York, had occasion, a short time since, to hold confirmation in a church in Westchester county, N. Y. Not knowing the exact locality of the building, he hailed some one by the way, and inquiring for Mr. D——'s church, received his directions, and rode on. Arrived, he alighted, and not readily finding the usual robing-room, inquired: "Where's your vestry?" "There is none in the church," was the reply. The bishop shrugged his shoulders, and retiring as modestly as was possible to the extreme corner of the church, doffed his outer habiliments, and loosening the carefully tied bundle, drew forth its contents, and prepared to array himself in the apostolic lawn. A suppressed sign of astonishment, on the part of the congregation, arrested his attention, and in the moment's pause, some one stepped up in evident confusion, with the remark: "There must be some mistake here, sir." "Why," rejoined the bishop, "isn't this Mr. D——'s church? I appointed to hold confirmation here to-day." "Well, sir, there's another Mr. D——, just beyond here, that keeps an Episcopal church; perhaps that's where you mean?" The bundle of canonicals, and the bishop with it, were seen leaving.

AMERICAN TACT AND ENERGY.

No one, who has mixed much with business men the world over, can have failed to be impressed with the superior energy, tact, mental rapidity and decision of the mercantile class in this country. They have all the qualities that command success, coupled with high honor, and there is no body of men whose manners are more refined or agreeable. But we do not propose to write a dull essay, but simply to make a statement of curious facts illustrative of our proposition.

Not long since, a merchant of this city found that a French Jew, who had been doing business in San Francisco, had taken French leave, owing him some seven thousand dollars for goods shipped to California, while he had "stuck" another merchant of this city to the extent of fifteen thousand dollars. It was known, or suspected, that the swindler had gone back to Paris. Our merchant accordingly wrote to the prefect of police, stating the circumstances, and giving a pen-and-ink portrait of the fugitive. He described him as a man of middle height, with a stoop, restless eyes, a partially bald head, a hooked nose, and a peculiar wart on his forehead. In due time he received a letter, saying that an individual answering the description had been "spotted." Our Bostonian received this letter on a Monday; the next Wednesday found him on board a Cunard steamer for Liverpool, furnished with credentials from the Governor of Massachusetts bearing the State seal, a general letter from the Mayor of Boston, with the city seal, and various other letters and documents. Arriving in Liverpool on Sunday, he saw the lions, visited some friends, and the next morning was en route for London on an express train. The next day he had an interview with Mr. Dallas, was appointed bearer of despatches to our minister in Paris, saw the Tower, Westminster Abbey, the Houses of Parliament, the queen's stables, and various other noted things, and was off the next morning for Paris as fast as steam could carry him. In Paris, he found that the bird had flown; but, in company with an officer, he tracked him to Strasburg, where all traces of him were, for the time being, lost. Strolling about the streets rather disconsolately with the French officer, our Bostonian saw a case of photographs over the way, and crossed the street to look at it. Among the interesting countenances on exhibition, was that of the very man he was in pursuit of. Through the photographer, his whereabouts and the assumed name he went by, were discovered. To make a long story short, the absconding debtor was sued, and a judgment obtained against him. He appealed, and the next court reversed the decision. The plaintiff took it up to the highest tribunal, and the decision of the first court was re-affirmed. The defendant, however, had contrived to alienate his property; and here was another apparent block in the game. However, our townsman discovered that the Jew had just shipped a large cargo of goods for California, and he obtained, by a decree of court, possession of the bills of lading, which of course gave him the control of the property, so that his agent in San Francisco laid claim to the cargo, and the Boston creditors finally succeeded in getting fifty cents on the dollar. Our adventurous merchant returned to this city after an absence from home of only six weeks, during which he had seen Liverpool, London and Paris, made a brief visit to Germany, successfully carried a case through three courts of law, visited several manufactories connected with his branch of business, and secured three lucrative agencies. We have abbreviated the narrative of many interesting details, but the main facts are, we believe, correctly stated. The hero of the adventure seems to think nothing of his exploit, and to look at it simply as an ordinary business transaction; but it strikes us as quite a romantic episode in the current of mercantile life, and as a felicitous example of the promptitude and energy of our people.

AN AWFUL SCENE.

We rarely meet in the pages of romance a scene more thrilling than that described by a correspondent of the Missouri Democrat, writing from Barclay's Fort, New Mexico. One cannot read the narrative without a thrill of terror. Four Mexicans, with a herd of cattle, were surrounded by fire while in a valley in the mountains. The long drought had rendered the rubbish and undergrowth below as dry as tinder, and the flames licked them up with fearful rapidity, and springing upward, caught the pine leaves above, glossy with resin, and then leaping from tree to tree, formed a billow of fire awful to behold. The affrighted herd, bellowing with fear, dashed through the flames, the most of them escaping badly burned, but some perished. Two of the herders attempted to follow them; but a few steps only were taken, when their nerves became contracted with the intense heat, their limbs refused to perform their office, and they sank shrieking on a bed of fire, never more to rise. Their comrades dashed wildly from side to side, already suffering in anticipation the agonies of a death too fearful to think of, when a huge rock barred their way, and they saw with a thrill of joy that a small spring of water gushed out at its foot. Everything combustible was removed, until the increasing heat forced them to desist; then inserting some dry branches in the crevices of the rock above the spring, they saturated their blankets with water and spread them out upon them, and seating themselves under their shelter, continued to apply the water as fast as the scanty supply permitted. Ashes, coals and burning branches fell thickly around them, and their hopes fluctuated rapidly between hope and despair, as their chances of escape increased or diminished. Moments seemed lengthened into hours, and doubtless more than the agonies of death were passed by these poor herders, ere hope ripened into certainty, and they knew that they were indeed saved as brands from the burning.

THE STEREOSCOPE.

One of the most interesting effects of the stereoscope is that which has been produced by Mr. De la Rue, who has contrived the means of giving apparent rotundity to the surface of the moon, as viewed through a powerful telescope. The disk of the full moon, however magnified, presents, as is well known, the appearance of a flat surface, with the lights and shadows marked seemingly on a plane; owing to the great distance of that luminary, whether it be looked at with one eye or with the other, therefore it seems moved beyond the operation of the ordinary course of stereoscopic effects. Nevertheless, photographs of the moon have been taken, which, when placed in the stereoscope, combine to form a solid-looking globe, on which all the lights and shadows are distinctly and beautifully delineated. This effect is produced by taking the photographs at different periods of the year, when there is a slight variation in the direction of the moon's face to the earth, and by combining these separate photographs into one image in the stereoscope, the form of the moon appears as convex as the surface of an artificial globe. There is also another arrangement by which the appearance of solidity is communicated to a single image formed on a screen of ground glass. The screen has a black back, and is placed in the focus of a lens in an ordinary camera obscura, wherein the image may be seen by looking down upon it. The particles of the roughened glass reflect to each eye different parts of the image focussed on the screen, and by this means a similar effect is produced as when two dissimilar pictures are looked at through a stereoscopic instrument.

THE GUILLOTINE.

This terrible instrument, which casts such a dark and bloody shadow over the period of the French Revolution; is generally supposed to have been invented by Dr. Joseph Ignatius Guillotin, a French physician, born at Saintes, in 1738, and it is also believed that the doctor suffered death by the contrivance which bears his name. But these are both popular errors. Guillotin died quietly in his bed at Paris, in 1814, up to which time he was in the enjoyment of a lucrative professional practice. He certainly, however, claimed the invention, the plan of which he submitted to the French National Assembly, of which he was a member, on the first of December, 1789, declaring, in words that have become historical: "With my machine, I sever your head in the twinkling of an eye, without subjecting you to pain."

But the mannaja, a precisely similar machine, was used in Italy certainly as early as the 16th century. In the year 1507, Demetri Justiniani was put to death in this way, at Genoa, for fomenting a popular sedition. An engraving of 1550 and another of 1553 represent the instrument. Morton, regent of Scotland, imported it into Edinburgh towards the close of the 16th century, and Tennant, who saw it in the latter part of the last century, describes it as follows: "It is a machine about ten feet high, having the shape of a painter's easel. Four feet from the base is a cross piece on which the victim rests his head, which is kept in place by a transverse bar placed above it. The interior faces of the uprights are furnished with grooves, in which is adjusted a very sharp axe, the upper part loaded with a heavy mass of lead. This mass is held at the top of the frame by a bolt, kept in place by means of a cord; the executioner cutting the cord, the axe falls and severs the victim's head." Sir Walter Scott, in his History of Scotland, gives a similar description. We believe the regent, with grim facetiousness, gave the title of the Maiden to this instrument of death.

This instrument was probably introduced into France after the early Italian wars. We find it employed at Toulouse, in 1632, for the execution of the Duke of Montmorency. "In this country," says Puysegur, "they make use of an axe, which is between two beams of wood; and when the head is placed on the block, the cord is loosed, it descends and separates the head from the body."

Certainly this instrument is an improvement on the system of manual decapitation, for, in using the sword and axe, the executioner, either from nervousness or want of skill, often terribly wounded and tortured the victim of the law before dealing the coup de grace. "If it is done, when it is done, then it were well it were done quickly," and surely. The guillotine is still used by the French government, while in some parts of Germany, the sword is still retained as the instrument of official death.

THE AGE OF GOLD.—A statement was lately presented to the Statistical Congress in England, by the delegates from Australia, in reference to the gold production of Australia proper, and of Tasmania and New Zealand. The details were somewhat voluminous, but the summing up made the yield of gold, from 1851 to the close of 1859, £101,371,828, or over five hundred millions of dollars. The American gold regions have yielded even more than this, since the California gold discoveries of 1848, and in round numbers it may be stated that in twelve years the addition to the world's stock of gold exceeds one thousand millions of dollars.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ENTHUSIASM.—When Dr. Hutton, the founder of the Huttonian theory, first observed in Glentilt veins of red granite traversing the black micaceous schist, he uttered a shout of exultation, which his guides ascribed to nothing less important than the discovery of a vein of gold or silver.

CHANCELLOR COKE.—Ex-Chancellor Coke, of Louisiana, is dead. He commenced the practice of the law nearly forty years ago, in Mississippi, and arrived at a high eminence in his profession early, and was rewarded by his fellow-citizens with public stations of honor and trust.

A TRUISM.—No girl is fit to be married till she is thoroughly acquainted with the mysteries of the culinary art, even if she is not called upon to practise them. The torch of wedded love is kindled by the kitchen fire.

A RELIC.—We saw, the other day, a mahogany bootjack which had belonged to Napoleon I. It showed that the emperor sometimes "put his foot in it."

GIVE THE DEVIL HIS DUE.—Certainly; but it is better to have no dealings with the devil, and then there will be nothing due him.

CONUNDRUM.—Why is a bad picture like weak tea? Because it is not well drawn.

DREADFUL ACCIDENTS.

Barthelemy, the French poet, in his famous ode to America, says :

"Dauntless in danger, strangers all to fear,
The sons of freedom push their high career,
A thousand steamboats, plough their furrows free
O'er giant rivers rushing to the sea;
A crash—a shock—one gallant boat is gone—
But the next thunders, all unheeding, on."

This is poetry and truth, but the fact is far from creditable. The firmness which confronts inevitable danger, is bravery—the impulse which courts destruction is suicidal rashness. No thinking man can close his eyes to the alarming fact that, as a people, the Americans entertain a culpable disregard of life. An awful steamboat catastrophe, by which perhaps sixty lives are lost, creates an impression that, beyond the circle of the friends of the sufferers, lasts hardly longer than a week. A steamboat, overloaded, with a cargo badly stowed, and a high-pressure engine, passes heedless over a spot where another equally precious-freighted boat has found a billowy tomb, without a thought of the horrid catastrophe. A dozen human beings are hurled into eternity by the crumbling of an ill-constructed warehouse, and in the very next street, perhaps, another construction is continued with the same murderous thrift of material. The laws, those reflexes of public sentiment, are culpably lax as regards the preservation of life. Were they more severe, the press would teem with fewer so-called accidents. Carelessness is contagious, and were the criminal neglect which is now termed carelessness, visited with severe punishment, we should have more careful railroad conductors, more careful steamboat captains and engineers, and more careful apothecaries than we have at present. How seldom do we hear of a railroad or steamboat accident in Great Britain! Yet England is covered with a net-work of iron rail, and the Thames with thousands of steamers. The reason is that the employees of corporations there answer with their lives, for the lives of those committed to their charge. The gallows and the transport-ship are severe but sure correctors of carelessness. The fault, however, of inadequate legislation, lies, in a country like ours, with the people and not the judicature. Here the people are the law-givers, and were public opinion more emphatic and unanimous, the lax legislation we have referred to could not exist. It may be, also, that blame rests upon the press, for not fulfilling its duty—for not faithfully echoing and recording public sentiment. Were the press true to itself and its great constituency, every sin of omission and commission would be duly signalized and gibbeted. There are a few papers in our midst, which do their duty as sentinels, faithfully and well, and these are generally well-sustained. If their example were universally followed, the interests of the community, their lives and property, would be adequately protected, although the "dreadful accident department" of that same press might suffer in consequence.

SILVER AND GOLD THREAD.

Among the European artisans, silver is generally the basis of what is called gold thread, and the silver in greatest favor with wire-drawers is extracted from lead. So great is the tenacity of even the finest size, that a piece of wire twelve inches long will bear twelve ounces in weight. Preparatory to spinning round the silk, the wire is flattened. The flattening machine consists of only two rollers for it to pass between, the one being about ten, and the other about four inches in diameter, and about two inches wide, slightly convex on the face. The wire so flattened is wound on small bobbins, which are placed on the edge of circular rings, attached to a bar over a spinning frame. On the front of the frame, twelve inches from the floor, are bobbins of silk, the threads of which ascend and pass through the centre of the ring to which the reel with wire is fixed. The whole is set in motion, and while the thread is being twisted, the ring with the wire revolves round the thread in the opposite direction, and thirty or forty threads are plaited at once. In its new form, though only gold is seen, probably nine-tenths of its bulk is silk, while of the remaining one-tenth only one-fiftieth part is gold; thus by labor and ingenuity, a gold thread is formed, of which only one part in five hundred is gold.

A GRAND INSTRUMENT.—An organ has been constructed at Vienna for the Sultan, which is the great wonder of the day. It cost 14,000 florins, and is a complete orchestra of fifty musicians, being equal to them in power and expression. There is a great rush to see it.

CONGENIALITY.—The sweetest and most satisfactory connections in life are those formed between persons of congenial minds, equally linked together by the conformity of their virtues, and by the ties of esteem.

REASON.—A vigorous writer has said: "He that will not reason is a bigot; he that cannot reason is a fool; and he that dare not reason is a slave."

KINDNESS.—Kindness is the ornament of man, as it is the chief glory of woman.

CHARACTERISTICS OF GREAT MEN.

Tasso's conversation was neither gay nor brilliant.—Dante was either taciturn or satirical.—Butler was sullen or biting.—Gray seldom talked or smiled.—Hogarth and Swift were very absent-minded in company.—Milton was unsociable and even irritable when pressed into conversation.—Kirwin, though copious and eloquent in public address, was meagre and dull in colloquial discourse.—Virgil was heavy in conversation.—La Fontaine appeared heavy, coarse and stupid; he could not speak and describe what he had just seen; but when he wrote he was the model of poetry.—Chaucer's silence was more agreeable than his conversation.—Dryden's conversation was slow and dull, his humors saturnine and reserved.—Descartes was silent in mixed company.—Corneille, in conversation, was so insipid that he never failed of wearying. He did not even speak correctly that language of which he was such a master.—Ben Jonson used to sit silent in company and imbibe his wine and their humors.—Southey was stiff, sedate, and wrapped up in asceticism.—Addison was good company with his intimate friends, but in mixed company was reserved and silent.—Junius was so modest that he could scarcely speak upon the most common subjects without a suffusion of blushes.—Fox, in conversation, never flagged, his animation and variety were inexhaustible.—Dr. Bently was loquacious.—Grotius was very talkative.—Goldsmith wrote like an angel, and "talked like poor Poll."—Burke was eminently entertaining, enthusiastic and interesting in conversation.—Curran was a convivial deity, he soared into every region and was at home in all.—Dr. Birch dreaded a pen as he did a torpedo; but he could talk like running water.—Dr. Johnson wrote monotonously and ponderously, but in conversation his words were close and sinewy; and if his pistol missed fire, he knocked down his antagonist with the butt end of it.—Coleridge, in conversation, was full of acuteness and originality.—Leigh Hunt has been well termed the philosopher of hopefulness, and likened to a pleasant stream in conversation.—Carlyle doubts, objects, and constantly demurs.—Fisher Ames was a powerful and effective orator, and not the less distinguished in the social circle. He possessed a fluent language, a vivid fancy, and a well-stored memory.—Stuart, the American painter, was remarkable for his conversational powers.—Edgar A. Poe, in conversation, was full of imagery and eloquence.

MEN AND BOOKS.—Men, like books, have at each end a blank leaf—childhood and old age.

BACON ON DUELLING.

Bacon, while the attorney general of England, was called to deliver his judgment upon the theory and practice of duelling. The case arose upon information in the Star Chamber against Priest and Wright, who were convicted and sentenced to fine and imprisonment for sending and bearing a challenge to fight a duel. The whole charge of Bacon and the decree of his court are worthy of careful study. We cite only the following extracts: "Touching the causes of the duel, the first motive, no doubt, is a false and erroneous imagination of honor and credit; therefore the king, in his last proclamation, doth most aptly and excellently call them bewitching duels. For, if one judge truly, it is no better than a sorcery that enchanteth the spirits of young men that bear great minds with a false show; and a kind of satanical illusion and apparition of honor against law, against moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times and the valiantest nations. But then the seed of this mischief being such, it is nourished by vain discourses and green and unripe conceits, which, nevertheless, have so prevailed as though a man were sober-minded and a right believer touching the vanity and unlawfulness of these duels; yet the stream of vulgar opinion is such as imposeth a necessity upon men of value to conform themselves, or else there is no living or looking upon men's faces; so that we have not to do in this case so much with particular persons as with unsound and depraved opinions, like the dominations and spirits of the air which the Scripture speaketh of. Hereunto may be added that men have almost lost the true notion and understanding of fortitude and valor. For fortitude distinguisheth of the grounds of quarrels, whether they be just; and not only so, but whether they be worthy; and setteth a better price upon men's lives than to bestow them idly; nay, it is weakness and disesteem of a man's self to put a man's life upon such lieder performance. A man's life is not to be trifled away; it is to be offered up and sacrificed to honorable services, public merits, good causes and noble adventures. It is in expense of blood as it is in expense of money; it is no liberality to make a profusion of money upon every vain occasion; nor no more is it fortitude to make effusion of blood, except the case be of worth."

A TAX ON DANCING.—The government of French Guiana has imposed a tax on a license to dance. This puts taxation on a new footing.

THE HAPPIEST.—Those who live to benefit others, are the happiest of mortals.

Foreign Miscellany.

Sir Benjamin Brodie, the celebrated London surgeon, has become totally blind.

The present population of the city of Paris amounts to 1,800,000.

A horse-thief in London escaped detection lately by swallowing his false mustache.

The members of the Roman Catholic clergy in Austria number 28,000 individuals.

The Princess Frederick William of Prussia, it is said, now devotes much time to sculpture under the tuition of a distinguished artist of Berlin.

When the French empress at table speaks to any one not close to her, she has her words repeated by an aide-de-camp or chamberlain, who stands constantly by her side.

Heirs to the estate of Lord Townly are now called for through the English papers. This is one of the largest estates ever left in England, and is now in possession of the government.

There is to be erected in Copenhagen a superb monument in honor of the poet Oehlenschläger, surnamed the "Danish Shakspeare." He died about ten years ago.

The consumption of coal in France is 11,000,000 tons yearly—three-fifths of it in manufactures. A large portion of the whole is brought from abroad—1,000,000 tons from England, 2,700,000 from Germany, and 700,000 from Prussia. In 1858, the quantity supplied by England was only 500,000 tons, by Belgium 1,700,000, and by Prussia 20,000.

The population of Great Britain (England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland), by the census of 1858, was 28,664,362, and that of France by the census of 1858, was 36,205,792. The United States numbered 22,191,876 by the census of 1850, and the estimates of the present census, now in progress, range from thirty to thirty-three millions.

VIEWS ON THE HUDSON RIVER, NEW YORK.

THE Hudson, or North River, which we propose to illustrate and comment upon in the present number, is one of the most beautiful streams in the world. Inferior to many rivers in magnitude, it yields to none in picturesqueness and variety. Take away its castles and quaint old towers, and historical and legendary associations, and the lordly Rhine must yield in natural and intrinsic beauty to the Hudson. In many passages of his works, Washington Irving has painted its charms in language that has almost the force of color, while artists without number have reproduced some of its most enchanting features. Nor is it destitute of historical interest, for on its banks and waters were enacted some of the most stirring and important scenes in the great drama of the American Revolution. In describing an equestrian journey along its banks, Charles Fenno Hoffman remarks: "One can form no idea of the beauties of the Hudson from merely travelling through its valley in a steam-boat, though they have made the passage a hundred times, and at all seasons. Hamilton, the Men-and-Manners-man, who has with a pen worthy of the author of Cyril Thornton given an admirable description of the river itself, remarks, while acknowledging the grandeur of American scenery generally, that there are few spots throughout the Union to which the term picturesque can strictly be applied. The original landscapes of our flourishing growth of artists are disproving his assertion every day, and had he but made an excursion along either bank of the Hudson, he would have seen that the broad valley of this river alone affords exhaustless subjects for the pencil. My companion in the ride was one who, with a relish of nature as keen as my own, had enjoyed wide opportunities of improving his taste by travel, and we both agreed that a more exquisite chain of lake scenery we had never beheld. I say of lake scenery, for unless when upon the river or its immediate shore, it is only when on commanding heights, remote from the banks, that the numerous interlacing capes and headlands allow you to recognize the waters of the Hudson as forming one broad and continuous highway to the ocean."

FORT WASHINGTON DEPOT.

The first of our pictorial illustrations represents Fort Washington Depot, near the site of which a redoubt was erected during the Revolutionary War, when, as we before remarked, the Hudson was the theatre of thrilling events. King's Bridge is a picturesque spot, and is well delineated in our second engraving. This was an important point in the Revolution, from the fact that it was the only means of communication between New York island and the Westchester shore. It was strongly fortified, being covered by the redoubt situated on the height above the building on the left, which was strengthened after the British captured Fort Washington, and named Fort Prince in honor of Prince William, then in New York. Another of our engravings represents the railroad bridge over Spuyten Duyvil Creek, which empties into the Hudson. Block House Point, represented in another picture, is near the village of Bull's Ferry. Here the British erected a block house in 1780 to protect some woodcutters and encourage the Tories in the neighborhood. General Wayne, by the orders of Washington, made a spirited but unsuccessful attack on this block house. The village of Fort Lee is sketched as it now appears. The fort, which stood just upon the brow of the palisades above the village, was called originally Constitution, but was named Fort Lee in honor of the general, who was at that time the idol of the army. After the fall of Fort Washington the British crossed the river opposite Dobb's Ferry, and approached Fort Lee. Finding it impossible to defend it against such odds, Washington retreated through the State of New Jersey towards the Delaware, followed by Cornwallis. Almost all the material in the fort, together with numerous stores which had been accumulated here for the use of the army, fell into the hands of the victors, and the Americans suffered severe privations during the ensuing winter in consequence of this loss.

Let us now rapidly sketch some of the historical incidents connected with the Hudson River in the vicinity of New York. The possession of the city of New York, and the command of the Hudson River, was the primary object of the British after the evacuation of Boston in March, 1776. Anticipating this, Washington had forwarded troops and munitions of war to this point, and Putnam, who was placed in command, was instructed to erect fortifications to defend the approaches to the city, more particularly at King's-bridge and its vicinity. General Lee, who was in the early stages of the war held in high estimation for his engineering skill and military talent, and who had been sent by the commander-in-chief to inspect and report upon the proper points for fortifications, had reported in favor of strong defences at this place to defend the communication between the city and the main land. In April Washington arrived, and as soon as possible he reconnoitered the upper portion of the island in person, and gave directions for the commencement of works at different points. A breastwork was thrown up to command the bridge, and an advanced work, which was called Fort Independence, was built upon a knoll on the main land, to defend the entrance of Spuyten Duyvil Creek, or Harlem River, at its confluence with the Hudson. A strong work or citadel was to be erected on a rocky height about three miles south of the bridge, on the Hudson, to protect the channel of the river. This was named in honor of the chief, "Fort Washington." On Jeffrey's Point, projecting into the water to the left of the depot, a small redoubt was erected to protect the chevaux-de-frise intended to obstruct the navigation. The remains of this redoubt are very prominent, and although crowned by cedars of many years' growth, the outline of the work is as perfect as the day it was finished. All these fortifications were erected by Pennsylvania troops and militia, under the supervision of Colonel Rufus Putnam. Soon after the arrival of the British fleet in the lower bay, two ships, the Phoenix and the Rose, sailed up the river, exchanging broadsides with the forts, without material damage on either side and anchored in Tappan Sea. To prevent their return, and the approach of others, General Putnam placed obstructions across the channel between the works on Jeffrey's Point and Fort Lee on the opposite side of the river. These consisted of vessels anchored and sunk about eighty feet apart, with heavy logs secured between them, while other logs, sharpened at the ends, were fastened to their decks, which, when the vessels were careened, presented an apparently formidable barrier to the passage of ships under the fire of the forts. The British were alarmed, however, of the progress and strength of these obstructions by torres and others, and the two ships, taking advantage of the darkness, and being guided by a deserter, passed through a gap which was to have been closed that day, and escaped to the fleet below. No further attempts were made by the enemy's ships to pass the obstructions until the 9th of October, when the Roebuck, Phoenix, and Tartar, which had been lying for some time opposite Block House Point, got under way with their three masted ships, and came up the river before a southerly breeze.

BLOCK HOUSE POINT.

PORT JEFF, FROM WASHINGTON HEIGHTS.

Disregarding the fire of the batteries, which did them no apparent harm, they broke through the obstructions with ease, and passed on, driving before them several vessels and galleys which lay in the immediate vicinity. One of these, a sloop, on board of which was an infernal machine intended to sink the British ships, was struck by a shot and sunk. Another vessels loaded with rum, sugar and other supplies for the American army, was captured, as were the galleys. On the 11th, a vessel was descried coming down the river, and being mistaken for one of the enemy's tenders, was fired upon and three of the crew killed. It proved to be Washington's yacht, which had been up the river when the ships went up, and having slipped by them, was on its return.—The battle of Long Island had been fought, and the city being no longer tenable, the army had retreated to Harlem Plains, where it was assembled on the morning of the 12th of October, 1796, when word was brought to Washington that the enemy had passed through Hell-gate and landed a large body of troops on Throg's Neck, considerably in his rear, and threatened to cut off his communications with the country. It was plainly to be seen that the position of the army was a dangerous one; a council of officers so decided, and a retreat into Westchester county was agreed upon. Still, as Congress had passed a resolve directing that Forts Washington and Lee should be held for the purpose of guarding the river, a body of Pennsylvania troops under Colonel Magaw and Lieut. Colonel Cadwalader of Philadelphia, was left in the former with strict injunctions from Washington to defend it to the last extremity. The main army then crossed into Westchester county by way of King's-bridge, and formed a chain of fortified posts from the bridge to White Plains, where its left rested. On the 28th the battle of White Plains was fought, and Washington fell back to North-castle, where he was so strongly intrenched that Howe deemed it inexpedient to attack him, and withdrew his troops to invest Fort Washington. As soon as Washington was satisfied that this was his object, he threw a body of troops into the Jerseys to oppose any move in that direction, and held a council regarding the disposition of the fort and its garrison. His own earnest desire was that the fort should be abandoned and its defenders, who were the flower of his army, saved, and indeed he had ordered such a disposition, but his orders being discretionary, General Greene, who was warmly in favor of defending it to the last, had, instead of withdrawing the troops, sent over reinforcements. On the 15th, General Howe sent in a summons to surrender, threatening extremities in case he should have to carry it by assault. Colonel Magaw returned a spirited reply, informing him that, "actuated by the most glorious cause that mankind ever fought in, I am determined to defend this post to the last extremity." Notice of the summons was forwarded to the chief at Hackensack, and he immediately repaired to Fort Lee, where he arrived at nightfall. Finding that Greene and Putnam were over at the other fort, he took a boat to cross over and meet them there. He met them returning, and being assured that Magaw was confident of a successful defence, he reluctantly retraced his route, to await the issue of the morrow's battle.

The morning of the 16th opened upon the following disposition of the contending forces. In a small redoubt near King's-bridge, called Cockhill Fort, were a few men with two guns; between it and the Fort, on the same rocky range on which the fort stood, was another redoubt, called Fort Tryon, in which was Colonel Rawlings and a regiment of Maryland rifles. On the east, towards Harlem River, were some militia from the New Jersey flying camp under Colonel Baxter, while Colonel Cadwalader commanded a body of the same troops in the line towards New York. The plan of attack was as follows: General Knyphausen, with about 500 Hessian troops was to attack on the north, at the same time that Lord Percy, with a division of English and Hessian troops, assailed the lines on the south. Simultaneously with these movements, Brigadier General Matthews, supported by Cornwallis, was to cross the Harlem River under cover of the guns on the Westchester hills, while Colonel Stirling, with the 42d regiment, was to cross the same river near the present High bridge.

The guns of the redoubt on the Westchester side of Harlem River gave the signal of attack. Knyphausen divided his forces, and while one portion of them, under Colonel Rahl, attacked Cockhill Fort and drove out the few men who manned it, he, with the remainder, ascended the heights near Tubbyshook, and, clambering over rocks and felled trees, attacked Rawlings in Fort Tryon. A spirited defence was made by the riflemen, and many of the Hessians were slain by their unerring aim. Rahl coming up, the Americans were so greatly outnumbered that they were obliged to retire. Meantime, Lord Percy had landed near Harlem, and marching across the island, had confronted and attacked Cadwalader in the line of intrenchments towards New York. While these movements were taking place, Matthews and Stirling landed. The former made a desperate attack upon Colonel

Baxter and his militia, who were stationed in a redoubt, and after a severe contest, in which Baxter was killed, drove them back. Stirling, after making a feint to land, dropped down the river, and notwithstanding a galling fire from the Americans, by which many of his men were killed, he landed at the foot of the present 153d Street, and pushing up a wooden height, on which was a redoubt, he took it, making two hundred prisoners. Cadwalader had made such an obstinate defence, notwithstanding the immense superiority of Lord Percy's force, that the latter had been compelled to withdraw behind a wood for a time. The success of Matthews and Stirling, who were now pouring down upon his flanks, compelled him to retire, and as he did so, he was assailed by the united forces of all three. Gallantly fighting his way, he slowly fell back before the overwhelming number of his foes towards the fort. Washington, who, with his general officers had witnessed the attack and gallant defence from the brow of the palisades, now crossed the river and ascended the heights to Morris's house, from whence he had a better view of the contest. After remaining a short time in this exposed position he retired, and in a few minutes a party from Stirling's forces took possession of the mansion, little dreaming that four of the chief "rebel" commanders—Washington, Greene, Putnam and Mercer—had been so nearly within their grasp. By noon, all the gallant defenders of the fort were gathered within its walls, having been driven from their advanced posts by the immensely superior numbers of their enemies. Knyphausen, who had, after driving Rawlings and his riflemen into the fort, taken up a position behind a stone house, within a hundred yards, now sent in a flag with a second summons to surrender. Washington, from his position on the palisades, saw the flag go in, and knowing its object, he wrote a hurried note to Magaw, informing him that if he could hold out till night he would bring off the troops, and handed it to a Captain Gooch, who volunteered to deliver it to the colonel. Jumping into a boat at the water's edge, he hurried across, ran up to the fort, delivered the note, came out, and running and jumping from rock to rock, dodging the Hessians, some of whom had endeavored to take him, he reached his boat and recrossed to Fort Lee. The message came too late. The fort was crowded to repletion, and the enemy were in possession of the surrounding defences, from whence they could pour in a destructive fire, and Magaw found himself compelled to surrender himself and his garrison of over two thousand brave troops prisoners of war. At half-past one o'clock Washington had the inexpressible mortification of beholding the American flag lowered and the British flag raised on the staff of the fort.

THE BEST JEWEL TO WEAR.—Jewels are an ornament to women, but a blemish to men. They bespeak either effeminacy or a love of display. The hand of man is honored in working, for labor is his mission; and the hand that wears its riches on its finger has rarely worked honestly to win them. The best jewel a man can wear is his honor. Let that be bright and shining, well set in prudence, and all others must darken before it.—Thackeray.

OLD EPISCOPAL CHURCH, PERTH AMBOY, N. J.

SKETCHES OF PERTH AMBOY.

BOYS' SEMINARY AT PERTH AMBOY.

We are indebted to R. L. Midgley for the series of original drawings made for us upon the spot, from which the engravings on pages 510—514 have been prepared. They make us acquainted with some very interesting features and memorials of the flourishing town of Perth Amboy, N. J., around which cluster many interesting historical associations. Perth Amboy stands at the head of Raritan Bay, and at the mouth of Raritan River, about 25 miles from New York. It is situated in Perth Amboy township, on the left or north bank of the Raritan River, and at the south end of Staten Island Sound, about two miles northeast of South Amboy, where the Camden and Amboy Railroad connects with steamboats running to and from New York. The harbor is good and accessible. The village contains four churches, one academy, a lock factory, and a stoneware pottery. The shipping of the port June 30, 1852, amounted to an aggregate of 26,410 tons, enrolled and licensed, of which 20,583 tons were employed in the coast trade, and 4759 tons in steam navigation. During the year eight vessels, with an aggregate burthen of 1273 tons, were measured. It was incorporated in 1784. The population is about 2000. The first picture in the set is a representation of the monument of Abraham Clark, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. It is not in Perth Amboy, but in Rahway, seven miles distant, but as it is visible from the former place, we have introduced it into these series. It is a handsome obelisk of American marble, surrounded by an iron railing. The name of Clark, surrounded by a curve wreath of oak and laurel, occupies a cast iron-plate. The inscription reads as follows: "Abraham Clark, born at Rahway, N. J., February 15, 1728, died September 16, 17—." The third picture is a view of the Boys' Seminary, Perth Amboy, a neat structure, pleasantly situated, and surrounded by shrubbery and trees. It is a very well conducted institution, originally founded by Mr. Samuel Woodbridge, and in this school many graduates have gone forth, well qualified to adorn every walk of life. The second picture represents the old Episcopal church, erected 1721, and pulled down 1852, much to the regret of antiquarians. It was a solid, substantial edifice, without any pretensions to architectural beauty, but a thousand endearing associations were interwoven with its fabric. Our engraving is an accurate representation of the venerable edifice, long a time-honored landmark, replete with historical reminiscences, but now swept away by the strong hand of improvement, and yielding to a more becoming but far less interesting structure. The old Episcopal church stood on the summit of a hill, overlooking Prince's Bay, the end of Staten Island, and Biddle's Grove, while afar off it commanded a view of the Highlands marking the "Narrows," beyond which rolls the deep-heaving sea. Within, the high-backed seats and gilded sounding-board attested its age, while the marble slabs on each side of the pulpit perpetuated the memory of those who had adorned this house of God. Many a scene both of peace and war had this old building witnessed. Within its shade a trench was dug among the graves during the Revolutionary War, and from thence the sharp practice of an eighteen pounder, brought from New Brunswick in a baggage wagon under cover of night, caused a British brig of war to cut her cable and put to sea, but not until her heavy shot had repeatedly bored the church, and splintered the old gray tombstones which surrounded this sacred edifice of other days. We present herewith a sketch of one of those mutilated gravestones. What is left of the inscription reads as follows:—"M. Brymni o LV voyages—the merchant service between the ports of New York and London, approved himself a faithful and fortunate commander—of integrity and benevolence. He lived a singular example of piety and resignation to God; he died an amiable pattern XIV. July A. C., MDCCIXXII. ætatis LXXVIII—" When the British had possession of this city they stabled their horses in this church, just as they made a riding-school of our Old South. A huge mound in the rear marks the spot where the bodies of the Hessians were buried. Not far off stands the residence of the British governor, a large and beautiful structure even now, the court house, with its floors deeply dented by the burts of muskets, and discolored by dark stains, the old English custom house, still solid and strong, and the long, many-windowed barracks erected by the British for their troops. Indeed, the whole of this part of the country abounds with interesting mementoes of the times that tried men's souls. We wish that we had more of these mnemonic records of the past, these tangible records of our heroic days. When we reflect upon the power they possess upon the mind of carrying it back to the century that has elapsed, of awaking glowing patriotic feelings, we feel that it is desecration to level a single old monument so long as it resists the hand of time. Why could not the old church of Perth Amboy have been permitted to stand? Was its condition dangerous, or was it sacrificed merely to the love of novelty? If merely to secure a more beautiful edifice, we must say that the sacred love of beauty was in this case misplaced. The associations connected with the old building were worth all the pleasures imparted by the new—it would have been better even to have put up with inconveniences than to have obliterated a time-honored relic. But what is past is past. Let us hope, however, that the considerations we have urged may save other old buildings on which innovation looks with evil eye. There is the old Episcopal church in Cambridge, where Washington worshipped, hard by the elm where he first drew his sword in the service of his country. Should that venerable edifice be swept away or remodelled, we should feel as if we had lost an old friend, or suffered the mutilation of a limb. The last view is a picture of the Pagoda, Clifton Park, Staten Island, drawn expressly for us, and a gay and sparkling picture it is. The Pagoda is a very attractive resort, and visited by thousands of dusty and heated citizens of New York during the summer season. Each steamboat then goes freighted with a crowd of eager beings, thirsty for the fresh air and green woods of this little paradise, and it possesses the charm for the New Yorkers of combining excitement with the pleasure of change, as scarce a day passes without a visit from some military company, whose music swells and echoes among the trees, and whose brilliant uniforms and glittering arms are contrasted by the cool green foliage. The effect of military music and evolutions under such circumstances is greatly enhanced. There are fast folks and faster teams in abundance, while the park contains a hundred acres of hill and dale for those who prefer quiet walks and sylvan shades. Here ever and anon the loiterer surprises a party of young people engaged in the pleasures of the dance, or a picnic group ministering to the tastes of the palate. There is also an ice-cream and refreshment saloon, which is patronized in noiggardly manner.

A DELICATE REBUKE.

General Wilkinson was in 1777 an aid to General Gates, and by him sent to Congress, at Yorktown, with the despatches giving an account of the surrender of Sir John Burgoyne and the British army at Saratoga. On the way he spent a day at Reading, about fifty miles from Yorktown, with a young lady from Philadelphia, whom he afterwards married. When the despatches were read in Congress, propositions were made for paying a proper compliment to the favorite of General Gates, who brought us such pleasing news. Samuel Adams, with a grave and solemn face, moved Congress that the young gentleman be presented with a "pair of spurs."—Anecdotes of the Revolution.

MUTILATED GRAVESTONE.

GROWING OLD.

The dead are the only people that never grow old. Your little brother or sister that died long ago remains in death and remembrance, the same young thing, forever. It is fourteen years this evening, since the writer's sister left this world. She was fifteen years old then—she is fifteen years old yet. I have grown old, since then, by fourteen years, but she has never changed as they advanced; and if God spares me to fourscore, I never shall think of her as other than the youthful creature she faded. The other day I listened as a poor woman told the death of her first-born child. He was two years old. She had a small washing green, across which was stretched a rope that came in the middle close to the ground. The boy was leaning on the rope, swinging backwards and forwards, and shouting with delight. The mother went into the cottage and lost sight of him for a minute; and when she returned, the little man was lying across the rope dead! It had got under his chin; he had not sense to push it away, and he was suffocated. The mother told me, and I believe truly, that she had never been the same person since then; she thought of her child as an infant of two years yet; it is a little child she looks to meet at the gates of the Golden City. Had her child lived he would have been twenty years old now; he died, and he is only two; he is two yet; he will never be more than two. The little rosy face of that morning, and the little half articulate voice, would have been faintly remembered by the mother, had they gradually died away into boyhood and manhood; but that stereotyped them, and they remain unchanged.—Home Journal.

MALLEABLE GLASS.

Malleable glass (glass which can be beaten, drawn out, or extended), is a curiosity of science, although, doubtless, the glaziers would demur to its introduction into practical existence and utility, at least for window panes. Malleable glass was made in old Rome; and in the reign of Tiberius, a Roman artist had, according to Pliny, his house demolished—according to other writers, he was beheaded—for making glass malleable. The idea of discovering the secret was only ranked second to that of the philosopher's stone among alchemists; but in 1845, there is stated to have been discovered at St. Etienne, in France, the means of rendering glass as malleable when cold as when first drawn from the pot. The substance, silicon, is combined with various other substances, and can be obtained opaque, or transparent as crystal; it is described as very ductile and malleable, neither air nor acids acting on it.—Brother Jonathan.

The best way to humble a proud man is not to take any notice of him.

PARISIAN STREET SCENES.

There is a magic in the very name of Paris. Of all the cities of the old world, it is that to which travellers from all parts hasten with the greatest eagerness and quit with the greatest reluctance. It is the city of all others where the stranger can most readily make himself at home, particularly if he speaks the beautiful language of its people. No city of Europe is more beautiful or more progressive. For centuries it has been advancing in splendor, and is not yet finished. Constant changes are taking place in it. You leave it regretfully for a tour of a few months, and when you come back, you find, perhaps in some quarter where you left rickety and tumble-down piles of houses with narrow and filthy thoroughfares, spacious gas-lighted streets lined with splendid magazines and dwelling-places. No part of Louis Napoleon's administration is more creditable to him than the persistent policy which has led him to accomplish marvels in the improvement and embellishment of his capital. Whether or not selfish motives partly governed him, the results are the same. It is true that the broad avenues he has established now permit masses of troops to operate, and open a path for the passage and the sweep of cannon; but then the bills of mortality will show that the sanitary condition of the people has been essentially improved by these openings. If the government troops can penetrate to places that they could formerly reach only by a terrible sacrifice of life, disease is at the same time banished from those quarters. The pestilence which walks at noonday can no longer sweep them. So much for modern Paris. Nor is the universal liking felt for Paris a mystery. It pleases all because it caters for the tastes of all. If pleasure be the object of the visitor, here, as in ancient Corinth, he finds the cup of Circe filled to overflowing. If study be his object, where will he find greater facilities? If he be a painter, are there not the Louvre and Versailles? If fond of society, where are there coteries more brilliant and elegant manners more refined? If a recluse, he well knows that nothing is more complete than the solitude of a great city. In Paris there is perfect social freedom, however little political freedom is permitted. Above all things, life and property are safe. The police system is perfect. If its stringency be sometimes annoying to travellers, it is compensated by the perfect security it enjoys. Nothing like rowdyism can flourish in Paris. The dark days of street assassination are over. There is no haunt, as in other cities, where the police dare not penetrate. The police is ubiquitous. There are no "free fights" in that bright capital. A "short boy" or a "dead rabbit" would "spoil" there in twenty-four hours. And again, though living is dearer there than it used to be, you can dine well for a franc, though you may spend fifty if you choose. The man of moderate means can make himself comfortable at Paris; the millionaire can lead there the life of a Lucullus. On the pages now open before our readers, we publish a number of spirited engravings representing some of the interesting out-door characters that are to be met with in the French capital. The first of these is the vender of waffles, whose wares literally go off like hot cakes. The itinerant sellers of cakes, bonbons, fruit, etc., do a good business, as the French are very fond of delicacies, and are always munching something when they can hunt up a sou in their pockets. The food of the French is far less substantial than ours. Jarvis says: "The American laborer, who consumes in one day more meat than the family of a French ouvrier in a week, would famish upon their bill of fare. The necessity which begets many of their employments pays, also, but poor wages. Yet what would be considered in the United States as a tribute fit only for the swill-tub, would, by skill and economy, be made to furnish a wholesome meal. The dietetic misery of the former country would prove a savory competency of the latter. But, whatever may be the composition of their frugal repasts, they are eaten with a zest and good humor that are not always guests at more sumptuous repasts. The American laborer eats the same quality of meat and bread as his employer. Either of these, to a French workman, would be equivalent to a feast. His bread is coarser, meat inferior, and throughout his whole diet there is the same difference in quality as in his clothes. The science of living well at a cheap rate is not understood in the United States. General necessity has not as yet begotten that special knowledge. In Paris, thirteen sous will provide a tolerable dinner of a dish of soup, loaf of bread, and a plate of meat and vegetables mixed. This species of healthy and economical alimentation is the heritage of a large class of workmen, and even of impoverished students and artists, who seek these cheap restaurants under the convenient cloud of an incognito. There are other resorts where they can eat at the rate of fifteen sous by the first hour, eight sous by the second, and so on, the chief diet being roast veal, as good as any other, provided the alimentary faith is unshaken. We even find dinners at four sous, composed of four courses, as follows: vegetable soup, one sou; bread, one sou; montagnards (large red beans), one sou; coffee with sugar, one sou; or, four sous a head. It is needless to observe that to swallow the 'coffee' (which in Paris costs forty cents a pound) requires even more faith than the roast veal. Not a few sewing-girls, or domestics out of place, dine daily on a sou's worth of bread. The table-service of the dinner at four sous is very simple. The table is an enormous block of wood, the surface of which is dug out into the form of bowls and plates. To each hole are attached, with iron chains, knives, forks and spoons of the same metal. A bucket of water dashed over the whole serves to 'lay the table' for the dinners next in course." Our second sketch exhibits a house-painter, or out-door artist and decorator. He is descending his ladder after having given the finishing touches to a flourishing arabesque of grapes and vine-leaves, probably intended to indicate the establishment of a wine-dealer. There is a certain "proud humility" in his demeanor which leads us to imagine that he may once have entertained the hope of rivalling Horace Vernet or Ary Scheffer. But it is evident that his illusions have long since vanished. He has never "exposed" in the annual exhibition, has never been patronized by French bankers or Russian nobles, has failed, in short, to win the golden crown of high art. Yet in one sense his art is high enough—sometimes seven stories high, and no one can dispute that he has reached the "topmost round of the ladder." The next sketch introduces us to the student in the attic. The weather is bitterly cold, for our student, like the hero of one of Beranger's ballads,

"Blows his nails for dire Want of fire."

THE STUDENT IN HIS GARRET.

THE STREET SINGER.

And, moreover, he is accoutred in his great coat. Beneath his shelf of books, hang his pipe and tobacco pouch—those inseparable companions of the Parisian student. We are inclined to think that our friend is not a noceur—not one of those who spends his time in gay delights, dances at the Mabilles in summer, and at the masked balls in winter, not one who runs up a bill at the wine-merchant's, and then writes home to his provincial parents for a remittance because "books cost so much at Paris;" but, on the contrary, a pains-taking, hard-working fellow, living on bread and water, reading hard, and determined to make a name or die in the attempt. Very many of the students in Paris succumb to the temptations by which they are surrounded; but there are also many honorable exceptions. Our next sketch delineates a female street singer, clad in sordid garments, burthened with a child hanging to her back, and twanging the strings of a cracked guitar. She is screaming forth in a cracked voice some popular ditty, very likely the song composed by Queen Hortense, the mother of Louis Napoleon, for that is just now an especial favorite, telling how Dunois, the young and brave, was bound for Palestine, and how that courageous and gallant young gentleman requested St. Mary to grant his modest desire to be hailed the bravest of the brave and wed the fairest of the fair, and how after proving his title to peerless valor by hacking off the heads of numberless Paynim (what business had they to be Paynim?) he was rewarded by the hand of a certain Lady Isabelle, supposed to be the most beautiful of her sex. This same "Partant pour la Syrie" which we have placed in the lips of our itinerant singer, this dish of milk and water, is now the national air, and usurps the place of that noble Marseillaise, the battle-cry of a nation staking all for independence, which, if heard in the streets of Paris to-day, "would rouse the very stones to mutiny." The lowest of all occupations in Paris is that illustrated in our picture of the chiffonier or rag-picker. Yet these people who glean the garbage of the street sometimes, from such beginnings, amass fortunes. Jarvis says: "I hired for the winter a fine apartment of a chiffonier, who had become a merchant of meubles (furniture), with an annual income of $8000, and was the owner of a country-seat."

Another of our engravings represents a London rat-catcher who has found his way over to Paris to officiate at one of the rat-pits which his exiled countrymen have established in the French capital, much to the disgust of those Gauls, who have not yet been infected with the prevalent Anglo-mania. Ratting is a sport much relished by many of our cousins on the other side of the water, and ministers to those tastes which have furnished a theme for the invective and sarcasm of their Gallic neighbors. It cannot be denied that John Bull, in some of his favorite sports, lays himself open to censure. The prize-ring still-exists, a repulsive fact, cock-fighting is still patronized liberally. Still an improvement in manners is perceptible. A hundred years ago there were actually gladiatorial combats in England—noted swordsmen being matched against each other, and giving and receiving ghastly wounds. Among English sports, ratting holds no inconsiderable place, and we have devoted a page to its illustration. The scene of the sport, the rat-pit, is usually a hall in some tavern frequented by the farley. The rat-pits are constructed of wood and quadrangular, while the top of each angle of the pit is covered by a little round table of wood; to prevent the rats making their escape by rushing up the corners. They always congregate in this spot, piling themselves up into a pyramid. The rats are collected by a rat-catcher, and there are none more expert than those of England. They are transported to the scene of action in wire traps, and the rat-catcher, who is dexterous and bold, takes them out, one by one, by the tail, and drops them into the pit. The sport of ratting consists in killing the greatest number of vermin in the shortest space of time, and though ferrets and cats are sometimes pitted against them, yet the only legitimate combat is that between terriers, of different breeds, and rats. The terrier has a body of iron and a remarkable sagacity and aptitude for this service. A terrier beats a cat out and out in her own line of business. The rat dogs vary in weight, according to the breed, from 6 to 14 pounds. Large dogs are hampered by their weight. The combat requires great sagacity and great cunning in manœuvring. The rat often defends himself with vigor before being seized by the reins, and, once taken, may still turn and cruelly wound his adversary in the muzzle. But the latter, with a prodigious instinct of dynamics, shakes his head and jerks the rat with a very rapid alternate movement. Continual force accordingly overpowers all possibility of muscular contraction, and only a sharp squeak indicates his fury and distress. Large bets are made on the number of rats a dog can kill in a certain time. A little dog named Tiny, weighing 5 1-2 pounds, was very famous in the annals of the rat-pit. She once killed 200 rats in 59 minutes, 58 seconds, and crowned her glory on the 27th of March, 1848, by killing 100 rats in 29 minutes, 10 seconds. The exploits of the famous "Billy," almost stagger credulity. He once killed 50 rats in 6 minutes, 6 seconds, winning thirty guineas for his master, and beating a Berkshire dog which fell exhausted after killing the thirtieth rat. Billy has been immortalized by the pencil of Landseer, and his skin stuffed with great skill, is one of the attractions of the tavern where he passed his illustrious life and killed so many vermin. Rat-catching is a famous amusement in the old world, and many follow it as an avocation whereby to obtain at least a partial living.

HAPPINESS.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

The eager throng we pass or meet,
In busy mart or quiet street,
Toward this one mark forever press—
This empty search for happiness.

The chief desire, the earnest thought—
Not, am I doing as I ought?
But shall I, if I onward press,
Secure this longed-for happiness?

From point to point we vainly seek,
But find each effort false and weak:
Till weary with the fruitless task,
Its semblance serves us for a mask.

This word our fainting lips repeat,
This siren that allured our feet
From duty's path, will only lead
A false, delusive light to lead.

Sure, life has nobler aims than these,
In harmony with Heaven's decrees:
Vague yearnings after higher good
Than our weak hearts have understood!

When shall we learn with reverent faith,
To credit what our Father saith—
"All things shall freely added be
To him who seeketh first for me?"

Would it not purer joys create,
More worthy of our high estate,
To mend the same determined seal
The wrongs and ills of life to heal?

I think, in God's stupendous plan,
'Twere ne'er designed that any man
Should, heedless of life's myriad claims,
Make happiness his end and aim.

'Twere braver, and of praise more meet:
Though cruel thorns might press our feet—
To walk the path that Jesus trod,
Do right, and leave the event with God.

IN THE MIRE:

—OR,—

SUSIE DELMONT'S REVENGE.

BY MARY A. KEABLES.

"SUSAN, Susan!" rang out Aunt Esther's sharp voice.

"Susan, Susan!" came from the hills and the grottoes in a prolonged echo. Aunt Esther bit her thin lips, her gray eyes snapped as she struck at an unoffending sprig of honey-suckle that had escaped from lattice thralldom very spitefully with the broom handle.

Then Aunt Esther looked around, first over the hills, then towards the forest, then in the direction of the garden, and away in the vicinity of the arbor; but apparently her observations did not meet with the success she desired, for she bit her thin lips more fiercely, and struck at the honey-suckle more spitefully as she called out again:

"Susan, Susan!"

"Ma'am?" came in a timid, frightened tone, from a little piece of humanity that emerged just at that moment from the tall corn at the west of the little cottage—a little creature who looked too old for her years, dark, unprepossessing, and unattractive.

The child, if so we may term her—though fifteen summers had passed over her head—was dressed in a coarse frock of faded chintz, in sad contrast with Aunt Esther's French gingham. She carried her hands behind her, little sun-burned hands they were, and as she approached the woman who awaited her, she seemed more like a guilty culprit marching to execution, than the daughter of the talented and wealthy Squire Delmont and his beautiful wife, who, peace rest their ashes, lay in the little quiet churchyard at Rivernook.

When Susan had come quite near to Aunt Esther Delmont, that lady gave the girl a vigorous shake, and a quick blow upon the ear. The blood rushed to the orphan's pale, dark cheeks, and a light flashed in her large eyes, but Mrs. Delmont did not note this, only asked in a sharp, ringing tone:

"Should like to know where you've been, miss?"

No response being given to the interrogatory, the aunt saw fit to give the girl another vigorous shake which nearly threw poor Susan to the ground, and caused a small bit of crumpled paper to fall from her hand. Susan sprang quickly to regain the scrap of manuscript, but Aunt Esther was too quick for her, and obtained possession of the bit of paper herself.

It was only the fly-leaf from an old spelling book, written over in pencil. Mrs. Delmont glanced at it a moment with the most supreme contempt depicted upon her countenance, then, notwithstanding the girl's eager entreaty—"Please, aunt, let me have it"—she tore it into strips, and throwing them to the ground, placed her foot upon them, saying, sharply:

"Just go into the kitchen, miss, and 'tend to the baking! No more of such foolery as this. You can do that ironing, too, while you have a fire, it will save wood; and mind you have tea ready at precisely five o'clock, as I have company."

Glad to escape from her aunt's presence, Susan—or Susie, as her dead mother always used to call her—went around to the back door, into the small, sultry kitchen, where a roaring fire was raising the temperature still higher; there were tears on her cheeks, there was a wild, fierce throbbing of her heart, and her poor head, too. Susie went in from the cool breeze, from the beautiful breath of heaven, and continued the work from which she had escaped an hour before.

"O, dear, I wish I was dead—I do—I do!" sobbed Susie, as the tears mingled with the perspiration that trickled over her cheeks. "I do wish I was dead, I do!"

But Susie's wish did not do any good. She was alive, and likely to be so, despite the sultry August afternoon, the stifling kitchen with its hot stove, and the work she was obliged to do, although she nearly sank down with fatigue.

"O, dear, dear," sobbed Susie. She was not thinking then of her fatigue, of the sultry atmosphere, of her aching head, but of the little scrap of yellow manuscript Aunt Esther had destroyed. Poor Susie!

In the cool vine-shaded parlor, with its dimity and lace hangings, and its tasteful furniture and carpets—they once belonged to Susie's mother, and Aunt Esther said she just used them to keep them from getting moth eaten or spoiled—in that pleasant, cheery-looking room—it used to be Susie's mother's parlor once—sat Aunt Esther, holding an animated conversation with her "company."

Said "company" was a fine-looking young man, of perhaps some twenty-five years, with pleasing blue eyes, and a profusion of bright, sunny brown curls that shaded a high, broad forehead. There was a rather haughty curl of the bearded lips, half concealed as they were by whiskers and mustache, and the head was poised rather proudly, and yet no one ever thought of calling Charles Maynard either haughty or proud.

To give our hero a fair introduction to the reader, we will say he was a distant relative of Aunt Esther's husband, said husband being a very wife-obedient Benedict, by the way, Susie's father's own brother, too, though Susie's father was vastly different from her poor, henpecked Uncle Eben, who scarce dared say his soul was his own.

Charles Maynard, or rather Doctor Charles Maynard, was a graduate from one of the first medical institutions of the day, of course well educated, and although far from wealthy, he was not dependent entirely upon his profession for support. The young physician was just looking out a suitable location, and on his way to a neighboring village had stopped at Aunt Esther's cottage—in reality Susie's, for her father owned it—determining to rusticate a little before burying himself (we speak figuratively) in the arduous labors of his profession.

How smiling and condescending Aunt Esther was! Why oil couldn't have been smoother than her words, "my dear Charlie," or "my dear Doctor Maynard," or "my beloved Eben's relative," whenever she addressed him.

"A pleasant place you have here, Aunt Esther," the young man was saying, as he looped back the curtains, and put aside the honeysuckle to look out.

"O, la, yes, very pleasant for country, doctor."

"How long since you purchased it?"

Mrs. Delmont regarded the young man steadily an instant ere she answered. There was nothing quizzical in his glance, so laying the blessed unction to her soul that Doctor Charles Maynard was totally ignorant of her family affairs she replied unhesitatingly:

"Quite a number of years."

"Ah, yes, Uncle Eben built the house, I suppose." He said "uncle" for compliment's sake. "A perfect little gem of a cottage, looks quite enchanting from the road, and does credit to its designer."

"I always took quite an interest in such things," said Aunt Esther, modestly looking down, and toying with her silk-apron ribbon.

"Ah, you designed the house, then? It does you credit, Aunt Esther (aunt for compliment)."

Mrs. Delmont looked down and tapped her foot softly upon the carpet.

"I hear you have a niece of Uncle Eben's residing with you?" said young Maynard, at length, inquiringly, as he twirled a gold chain at his waist, and regarded the toe of his patent leather contemplatively.

Aunt Esther paused a moment as if thinking what answer to make, then she said, softly:

"Certainly, my dear Charlie, Eben's brother Henry left a daughter to our care."

"I heard something of it, it was five or six years ago that Uncle Henry and his wife died, was it not? I was in college at the time, and heard that they left but one child. Did he leave much property?"

Aunt Esther apparently did not hear the latter question, for she said, contemplatively:

"Yes, it was five or six years ago. Poor Henry, poor Edith! they left their dear little Susie for Eben and me to care for, and we have done the best we could for the dear child. She has been like our child to us, rather wayward, to be sure, yet all children have their faults, and I never lay up anything against her; our own daughter could not have been more tenderly reared than Susie has been."

At that moment the door opened and a girl, gay and dashing, with books under her arm, apparently just from school, entered the room. She gave quite a stare as her eyes fell upon the young doctor, but Mrs. Delmont hastened to give them an introduction.

"My only daughter Angeline—Doctor Charles Maynard, from — University—your dear father's relative, my love."

Miss Angeline made a suitable obeisance, and young Maynard took up the conversation where it had been dropped. Mrs. Delmont with apparent carelessness arose, went to the table, turning her face from her guest, and attracting the attention of her daughter, gave her a significant look, and placed her fingers upon her lips. The girl understood the sign, and Mrs. Delmont continued the conversation.

"Yes, Susie, as I said, has been like our own child to me. Angeline don't seem but a little nearer to me than Susie. I'm sorry she's gone, she would be so pleased to see you, I know. She's gone to the city on a visit, and will not return for several weeks."

"Ah, excuse me, Aunt Esther, but I heard you call the name 'Susan' an hour or so ago; you then have more than one of that name in the family?"

It was well for Mrs. Delmont that her face at that moment was turned from her guest, for the hot blood suffused it as she suddenly recollected the manner in which she had treated her husband's niece, and now she had ample reason to suppose the young man had been a witness to the whole transaction. But she was not to be foiled thus; she had begun to deceive, she would keep up the deception. She felt that she would be ruined if her perfidy was thus and there discovered. She laughed carelessly.

"Yes," she said, "two of the same name, a poor trollop of a thing—a poor-house creature that we took pity on, and have given a home for her services—she wont answer to any other name but Susan, so Susan it has to be. I hope you didn't think I would speak as I did to my beloved Eben's niece?"

Doctor Maynard declared he hadn't such a thought, so Mrs. Delmont excused herself for a moment, leaving her guest to the tender mercies of her dashing daughter Angeline.

Mrs. Delmont paced back and forth the length of the hall several times; evidently her mind was very ill at ease, she felt that she had settled herself very nicely into the mire, and how to get out troubled her; all at once she spoke up in a quick tone of alarm:

"Angeline!"

"What, mother?" came from the parlor.

"Come here quick, just a moment, see what Cato has done."

Mrs. Delmont stood out at the further end of the porch and in a moment her daughter joined her. Bending over, apparently examining a shrub in a small ornamental flower-pot, Mrs. Delmont said, in a low, hurried tone:

"Angeline, have nothing whatever to say to him about Susan; what you might say would probably contradict what I have said. Remember and be careful."

"But what do you want to deceive him for?" asked Angeline.

"I haven't time to tell you now—it is for your sake, Angeline—look your best—he is a fish worth catching—fine fellow, good-looking, and all that—good profession, and well enough off. I'd like to see you married well before Susan is eighteen."

"But perhaps she wont marry when she's eighteen, and if she don't—"

Mrs. Delmont placed her finger upon her lips, and then said, in a still lower voice:

"If she don't it will be all right, but that is the thing, if she should find out the conditions of her father's will, she—"

"Yes, yes, I understand, where is she?"

"In the kitchen."

"Quite a clever idea your saying she had gone to the city, if we can only keep the minx out of the way while he is here; if he should discover our deception all would be ruined."

Miss Angeline spoke low, but not so low but what a part of the sentence reached the ear of the young man, who had followed them unobserved.

"Ruined, did you say?" he questioned. "It is a pity—a beautiful flower, Miss Angeline—did you say it was ruined?" And he pointed to the shrub apparently under observation.

There was a strange sparkle in his eyes. Mrs. Delmont noticed it, and the blood rushed to her neck and brow, to the very roots of her hair, while Miss Angeline turned in a dauntless manner to the young physician, and surmising he might have overheard more than he pretended, she said unhesitatingly:

"We were not speaking of the flower, Doctor Maynard, but of a little innocent trick we have been playing on the schoolmaster of the district, who occasionally boards here, and has taken quite a fancy to the kitchen girl Sukie, or Susan as she will persist in being called. Ha, ha, you see Cousin Susan has gone to the city, and so I told him to-day at school that Susan had gone, and he thought I meant his Susan. Ha, ha, I was just telling ma that if he should call this evening we must keep the girl Sukie out of his way, or he would discover our deception, and our plans to break up this ridiculous match would be ruined." What an adept Miss Angeline was at lying!

"And what makes you wish to break up the match?" questioned Charlie, who had heard the whole of Angeline's remark previous to his being discovered by her, and but for her artful explanation so skillfully worded, all would have been lost indeed in the way of their plotting. All, however, seemed plain to his mind now, and if he had had any suspicions they were allayed entirely.

Miss Angeline was in for it now, she had put her feet in the mire now, and she felt herself going down deeper and deeper, figuratively speaking. She threw up her hands with a mighty desire to save herself, and with this aim in view, she said, in order to gain time:

"Why do we wish to break up the match?"

"Yes, that was what I asked, if the question is not impertinent."

Mrs. Delmont came to the rescue. She laughed a sort of contemptuous laugh, and said, carelessly:

"A good reason enough, my dear nephew; the girl is scarcely fourteen, a poor witless creature, who is exceedingly unfit for a wife, and he is not much better, and worse than all hasn't a cent to call his own. It would be hard to tell which would be the worse cheated should they marry, he or she, and I feel it my duty as a Christian woman to break up any such alliance, and my daughter, I am happy to say, sympathizes with me."

A peculiar light flashed in the young man's eyes, but he only smiled, and said pleasantly:

"A man with an education is never poor, I think, Aunt Esther."

"Education!" And Mrs. Delmont laughed scornfully.

"Yes, I said 'education,' Aunt Esther."

"Education—yes, if he had an education, but he hasn't enough to do him much good, yet sufficient to be of incalculable harm."

"How so?"

"A little learning's a dangerous thing," is an old saying, you know."

"Yes, I know; but I had two reasons for supposing the young pedagogue well educated, the first because Miss Angeline was his pupil."

Mrs. Delmont interrupted him. "O, Angeline does not attend his school."

"Ah, pardon me, Aunt Esther, I inferred she did from her saying she told him so and so in school to-day."

Miss Angeline felt that they were sinking still deeper into the mire, and she made another mighty effort to extricate herself. So she laughed lightly and said:

"So I did, to be sure, doctor, yet I was just going past the school-house, and stepped in. I never attend school there, the books I brought home belonged to Sukie, who has been going until we discovered the unfortunate attachment growing up between her and the pedagogue."

"Quite advanced in her studies, is she not, for a poor-house child?" queried the young man, toying with a sprig of honey-suckle. "She must be very quick and bright, too, for a girl of fourteen?"

"Dull enough, you may depend," said Mrs. Delmont, who, less quick-sighted than her daughter, could not understand the drift of her guest's remarks; but Angeline, anticipating the answer upon the young man's lips, was about to differ with her mother in that respect, and say Sukie was uncommonly bright, but at that instant she happened to remember her own words, a few moments previous, so she paused in confusion, while Doctor Maynard said:

"I supposed, judging from the books Miss Angeline said belonged to the girl, and that she studied at school, which I saw a few moments since upon the table, that she must be quite intelligent for her years, for astronomy, philosophy and botany require a small allowance of brains in the pupil's head, as well as a slight knowledge of those studies by the teacher, to enable him to explain them correctly."

Miss Angeline remembered with agony that she had left her school books upon the parlor table, and she felt that she was sinking deeper, still deeper in the mire, every attempt to extricate herself only plunging her deeper. While she paused to think of a suitable reply to make, a curious smile curled the bearded lips of Doctor Maynard, and he said, still carelessly and pleasantly:

"I am sorry, Aunt Esther, you have so poor an opinion of my friend, Harry Whitman."

"Your friend?" gasped Mrs. Delmont.

"Your friend?" ejaculated Miss Angeline.

"Yes, my friend, Aunt Esther, he and I graduated from the same university four years ago, and I had always thought him as well educated as he was clever, and intelligent; to tell you the truth, my accepting your kind invitation to spend a day or two here was partially owing to the fact that I wished to see my old chum, who I knew was teaching in your neighborhood. However, as your opinion of him is so low I could not expect you to entertain so vulgar and unlearned a personage, and will therefore call upon him at his boarding-house, if you will tell me where it is."

Mrs. Delmont seeing how matters were turning, made one frantic effort to save herself and daughter.

"I hope you did not think I meant the handsome and intelligent Mr. Whitman of a neighboring district; every one must acknowledge he is far from being what I have described the pedagogue of our district to be. Angeline attends his school, and as she must pass directly by the other school-house on her way, that is the way she happened to call for Sukie's books."

Mrs. Delmont felt that she had gained a little firmer standing, but her self-congratulations were few, for with the pleasantest of smiles the young man continued:

"I should think that a very good way would be to place this Sukie, as you call her, under the tuition of Mr. Whitman. Surely, he would be a more able teacher of philosophy, astronomy, history and botany than the numskull you have described as her tutor."

Again Mrs. Delmont felt herself sinking. O, how much as that moment would she have given if she had not taken her first step into the mire of deception! Angeline came to the rescue of her mother.

"It all comes of her infatuation, you will perceive," she said, in a slightly impatient tone. "Ma and I both wished her to attend Mr. Whitman's school, but she wouldn't."

Mrs. Delmont felt that they had gained good standing for a time, at least, that is if nothing more was said on the subject; so she excused herself on the plea of arranging supper, and making a sufficient sign to her daughter that implied silence on the subject they had been dwelling upon, Mrs. Delmont left her daughter and guest alone.

The bits of paper Aunt Esther had placed her foot upon, covered with the pencilled writing of the girl he had learned was named Sukie, still lay in the gravelled walk. The young man stepped down from the porch, picked them up and placed them carefully in his vest pocket, of course Miss Angeline did not know wherefore.

Miss Angeline found her guest rather unsocial, her graces and blandishments proving in vain; he remained moody and silent, except when addressed by his fair companion, then answering principally in monosyllables. Miss Angeline saw that she had lost ground considerably in the past hour, and after wearying herself in her unsuccessful efforts to wear away the unpleasant impression evidently left upon the young man's mind, she became rather vexed, and begging to be excused, sought her mother in the dining-room, leaving her guest alone. He, in the meantime took the opportunity to draw the yellow bits of torn paper from his pocket, spread them upon the table, and arranged them in such a manner that he could with ease decipher the words.

The penmanship was quite poor, many of the letters being made in a printed form as if the writer was unable to write them; but Charles Maynard did not note this particular, it was the touching yet simple outpouring of an orphan's bleeding heart, that caused the tears to come into his eyes, tears in the laughing blue eyes of Doctor Charles Maynard.

"Poor child," he murmured, as he folded the bits of paper and replaced them in his vest pocket. "Poor child, she has a soul if she is a pauper!"

The young man paced the room several times, and then took the bits of paper from his pocket, and examined them again. Strange, he thought, that a girl studying philosophy and astronomy, etc., should write so miserably as that! Then there was so much talent evinced in the composition of the simple and touching rhyme, it might be this was but a copy of some verses that the girl had found somewhere, or that had been given to her. We do not know how long Charles Maynard might have pondered upon the subject, but at that very moment, almost before he had time to conceal the bits of paper, Mrs. Delmont entered the parlor and announced that tea was ready.

Uncle Eben was already at the table. He was a meek-looking individual, with hair between a flaxen and a gray, a ruddy complexion and rather full habit. Said Uncle Eben looked at his wife deprecatingly, then exclaimed, "How do do, dock?" then looked at his plate industriously, until the tea was poured, and Aunt Esther stepped on his toe zealously, and looked meaningly at the bread tray, whereupon Uncle Eben passed the bread, and butter, cheese, etc., and then began to use his own knife and fork with laudable industry. There was no such thing as entering into conversation with Mr. Eben Delmont; after several ineffectual attempts Charles Maynard gave up in despair, and except an occasional remark from Mrs. Delmont, the supper hour passed away in silence.

And Susie, poor, little, weary, down-trodden

Susie, where was she? Charged by her aunt under no circumstances whatever to allow herself to be seen by the gentleman then at the house, as he was a sheriff who had come to arrest her for her father's crimes. Poor Susie—her father's crimes! She had always believed her father, who was now dead, to have been a good and honest man, and the poor child knew so little of law she believed Aunt Esther, and feared encountering the dreadful stranger. So he crept away, out into the garden, out into the waving, tasselled corn, and through that into the orchard beyond, where beneath a great wide-spreading apple tree she lay down on the grass and wept, wept until sleep locked her senses, and she forgot her troubles in the happier realms of dream-land.

She awoke with a start; night had come, and the moon and stars were shining brightly in the heavens, while the air came up cool from over the hills, and played coyly with the girl's dark, tangled hair. She looked around her in a half-bewildered way, and what was her surprise and terror when directly before her she espied our hero, Charles Maynard. She staggered to her feet, and attempted to run from the spot, but a treacherous stick upon which she trod giving way, she was precipitated to the ground, and the next moment she felt a hand laid lightly upon her arm.

"Please don't take me to prison, sir; please don't!" she cried in alarm.

"To prison?"

"Wasn't it there you was going to take me?" she questioned, still trembling like a frightened bird, and trying to escape from the grasp he still maintained upon her arm.

"Certainly not. What made you think that?"

"Aren't you the gentleman stopping at Aunt Esther's?"

"I am stopping at Mrs. Delmont's; but do you call her Aunt Esther?"

"Why, yes, she always told me to," replied the girl, wonderingly. Then she added, "So you are not going to arrest me?"

"Certainly not."

"Aren't you a sheriff?"

"Why, no, you silly girl—a sheriff? No. What made you think that?"

"She told me you was, and that I must keep out of your way, for that you wanted to arrest me for a crime of my dead father's."

"Who told you so?"

"Aunt Esther."

"And you thought I could arrest you for the crimes of your father, did you?"

The girl hung down her head.

"Come, come, you're not much of a lawyer; but I guess you have been dreaming all this nonsense. I don't think Mrs. Delmont ever told you such stuff as this."

The girl made no reply, only made another effort to free herself from the young man's grasp.

"Stop, Susan—that is your name, isn't it?—stop a minute, I want to ask you something. Who wrote this?"

The young man took the bits of paper from his pocket and held them up before the girl. She grasped after them eagerly.

"Please let me have them, sir?"

"Tell me, then, who wrote what is on them?"

The girl looked up honestly into his face, a little blush upon her dark cheeks, but she answered unhesitatingly:

"I did, sir."

"And that is your writing?"

"Ye, sir."

"Why don't you write better?"

The girl burst into tears. "Please, sir," she said, "I never have had a copy to write by since my father and mother died, and I was only ten years old then, and I have forgotten a great deal since that time."

"Why don't you write at school?"

"At school?"

"Yes, it would be better for you than to study philosophy and astronomy, and—"

"Philosophy and astronomy! Go to school?" interrupted poor Susie, with astonishment.

"Yes."

"I don't go to school."

"But you might."

"Who said I might? Aunt Esther always wants me to work, and I never went to school a day since I lived with her!"

Charles Maynard was astonished—there was a strange difference between the story of this girl and Mrs. Delmont's; which could it be that deceived? He looked the girl straight in the face, as he asked:

"Has Mrs. Delmont never sent you to school?"

"No, sir."

"And how long have you lived with her?"

"Five or six years."

"And you have never studied astronomy or—"

"I never have studied anything, sir; only sometimes after I get my work done, I read and learn verses—such sweet verses they are, sir!"

"What?"

The girl took a small edition of Watts's hymns from her dress pocket. The book had no cover, was torn and soiled, yet the child loved it.

"And where did you get this?"

"It was my mother's," replied the girl; "it was under her pillow when she died." Tears drenched the dark cheeks, as she spoke.

The young man gave back the book, and then he said:

"Did your mother die in the poor-house?"

"Poor-house!"

The girl started back in amazement too real to be feigned, so Charles Maynard rightly thought.

"Yes—did she?"

"My mother—my beautiful mother, died in a poor-house?" The hot blood dashed up into her cheeks, as she spoke. "No, sir—the room they will give you to-night is the room where my mother died—my sweet mother!" And the child put her hands over her face and wept.

"Don't cry, my little girl!" The young man spoke kindly, but there were strange feelings taking possession of him, as he gradually discovered Mrs. Delmont's deception—although he never once mistrusted it was Susie Delmont before him.

They were a strange couple there in the old orchard, beneath the moonlight—he so tall, dignified and handsome, Susie with her slight, shrinking form shaking with sobs she could not control—he so richly and becomingly dressed, she attired in faded, slimsy calico, tattered, and her only ornament the luxuriant, though tangled dark hair that fell over her shoulders.

"Tell me all about your mother—come, I'll listen to you! But first tell me your name."

"You called it, sir—it's Susan."

"Yes, but your other?"

"Why, the same as Aunt Esther's, sir. Uncle Eben and father were brothers; that is the way I come to live here. Uncle Eben is my guardian."

"And you are Susan Delmont?"

"Please, sir, yes."

"And is there any other Susan in the family?" asked the young man, with astonishment.

"No, sir."

The young man ground his teeth with rage. He grasped the girl's shoulder and turned her face to the moonlight, while his own brow was white as the light that lay on the hill-tops, and his whole countenance worked convulsively.

Then he turned from her and strode up and down the orchard paths—the girl, standing like a statue, gazing after him as if bewildered.

"Fool! fool!" He beat upon his forehead, and then upon his breast, and still muttered to himself, yet half aloud: "Curses on her! curses on her!"

His manner terrified the girl. She started, and would have fled from him, but he arrested the movement by saying:

"Stop, Susan!"

"Why?" She looked up into his face strangely, doubtfully.

He looked down into the innocent, timid face, with that seal of sorrow and loneliness upon it.

"Susan," he said, "your aunt has deceived me. I need not tell you how. It was principally to see you that I came here, but Mrs. Delmont said you had gone to the city."

"I never was in the city in my life, sir."

"Listen, my child!" He spoke very tenderly. "I know more of the affairs of Susie Delmont than she does herself, I presume. You have been kept in the most total ignorance for purposes I can well understand. Susie, did you know that you are an heiress, on condition? Did you know that besides this cottage, and these broad, well-cultivated lands, you will come into possession of quite a large sum of money after your majority?"

"Why, Aunt Esther said that father owed it all to Uncle Eben?"

"The miserable woman!" The young man stamped his foot, and ground his white teeth.

"'Tis no such thing; and yet she is planning for all your property, my child. That is just as true as gospel, and she's keeping you in ignorance in order to do it. Did you never hear about your father's will?"

A crimson flush passed over the sweet face—sweet if it was traced over with prints of grief and care, it was so innocent.

"Tell me, Susie!"

"Yes, I heard something once; the school-master told it to me. He boarded here awhile. His name is Mr. Whitman. He told me—"

The girl blushed deeper.

"What did he tell you? Tell me all, Susie!"

The girl raised her innocent eyes to the young man's face, and said:

"I don't believe it is so, sir, but Mr. Whitman told me that I was an heiress, or would be, if I married the man my father had chosen for me, and that if I did not, the property would still be kept in charge of Uncle Eben—I don't know how long; but Aunt Esther heard what he said, and she was awful angry, and she said there was not a word of truth about it—that Uncle Eben owned everything that belonged to father, and she was to have everything that mother used to own. She said I was nothing but a beggar, and if it wasn't for her, I would have to go to the poor-house; but"—here the girl stopped to cry a little, very quietly—"I believe I would rather live in a poor-house than here."

"Poor child!" Charles Maynard laid his hand kindly upon the girl's shoulder. "But tell me, my dear—did you hear the name of the man your father wished you to marry?"

The girl shook her head.

The young man gave a sigh of relief.

"We will have a new leaf turned over, my child," he said, kindly. "You shall live in this way no longer. If you desire an education, you shall have it. Here, sit down under this tree, and let us plan a little. Why, zounds, you don't even know my name—do you, little one? Well, 'tis Charlie Maynard."

That evening, when the two parted, there was a gleam of triumph in the young man's eye, and a sparkle of happiness in little Susie's that even Aunt Esther's harsh reprimand could not drive away.

The next morning, Susie was called in vain to. "Susan! Susan!"

No reply. Aunt Esther forced herself out of bed, and up stairs into the poorly furnished bedroom that had been allowed to Susan for her own apartment. To her surprise, she found the bed undisturbed and Susie minus.

Of course all was excitement immediately—that is, in the minds of the trio, Mrs. and Mr. (that is the order in which they stood) Mrs. and Mr. Delmont, and Angeline. The former, assisted by her obedient spouse, was obliged to prepare breakfast—the said spouse turning the griddle-cakes and steak, and attending to the coffee, while Mrs. Delmont set the table, etc. Angeline spent the time in making her toilet, and a few moments before breakfast joined Mr. Maynard in the garden, looking very bewitching in a flounced lawn, with numerous bows of pink ribbon adorning the sleeves and bodice. Of course Mr. Maynard offered his arm to escort Miss Angeline to breakfast, said arm being accepted with the utmost alacrity by the aforesaid Angeline, who congratulated herself that her flounced lawn, with its gay bows, had already nearly achieved a conquest of the said Maynard's obdurate heart.

Mrs. Delmont anxiously inquired if Mr. Maynard intended to visit his friend, Mr. Whitman, and to her infinite relief a reply was given in the negative. Mr. Maynard said he had changed his mind, as he had important business to attend to in a neighboring village. So immediately after breakfast Uncle Eben brought his guest's pony around to the front gate, and the said guest, after thanking Aunt Esther for her hospitality, and pressing Miss Angeline's hand warmly, bidding her adieu, was about taking his departure, when, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he took a note-book and pencil from his pocket and asked, hurriedly:

"You said Cousin Susie had gone to the city. I am quite anxious to see her, and if you will give me her address—"

"And why so anxious?" queried Mrs. Esther Delmont, with ill-concealed vexation.

"Is it possible you can be ignorant of the cause, Aunt Esther?" questioned the young man. "You surely are acquainted with the provisions of Uncle Henry's will, in which he de sires me to be Susie's life protector—in other words her husband, Aunt Esther—and that only on these conditions can she inherit the handsome estate thus singularly bequeathed, Otherwise—"

"Well, what otherwise?" asked Aunt Esther, excitedly.

"You certainly cannot be ignorant of the manner in which the will reads, Aunt Esther; and you surely do not forget that in case Susie does not comply with these conditions, the property will fall into the possession of a certain young gentleman known to you as Charles Maynard—that is, if Miss Susie refuses to fulfil her part of the solemn compact—while if the said young gentleman is the aggressor, the property will remain in the guardian's hands, and only upon the death of said guardian, shall fall into the possession of said Susie. Uncle Henry made a strange will, Aunt Esther; but you cannot wonder, under existing circumstances, that I should wish to see Miss Susie."

Charles Maynard bowed, and waited for the address. Miss Delmont stammered and blushed, and said she had really forgotten it.

The young man restored his note-book and pencil to their accustomed place, bowed smilingly to Aunt Esther and the fair Angeline, and bounding into the saddle, and putting spurs to his horse, he was soon lost to the view of those who watched his retreating figure from the cottage.

"A pretty kettle of fish we are in!" snapped Miss Angeline.

"Too bad! too bad!" sighed Mrs. Delmont.

"And it all comes of your trying to deceive him!" upbraided the daughter.

"Do you think I would acknowledge that I let my husband's brother's child and heiress, too, do my drudgery and receive such abuse as he witnessed, for I was so angry with the imp!"

But the next question was—where was she? Mrs. Delmont was troubled. Mr. Delmont was troubled, and Miss Angeline was ditto. Where had the girl gone?

"There's one way!" said Mrs. Delmont, at length, in a decided manner, as she laid a hand upon her husband's and daughter's shoulder.

"If Susan was only dead—"

"What then?"

"The property would fall to Charles Maynard, and—"

"What, mother?"

"In that way you might become mistress of it all!"

"How, mother?"

"How dumb you are! With your beauty and advantages, don't you suppose you could win Charles Maynard?"

"Couldn't say."

"Well, I can say for you, then. I tell you, Angeline Delmont, you don't know what a planning and scheming woman can do; you haven't any idea. Now, here is the case—it lies just here; either you become the wife of Charles Maynard, or we will have to go from here in less than five years, and not a dollar of our own in the world."

"Then what is to be done?"

"Listen!"

"I am listening."

"Can you imitate Susan's hand-writing?"

"O, yes. You know I am a proficient in the art of imitating."

"Well, then, write what I dictate; and you, Eben (addressing her husband), you go and bring Selim around, with the side-saddle, in five minutes! Don't let the grass grow under your feet, now!"

About three miles from the cottage of the Delmonts ran the beautiful, deep, but narrow stream known for miles around as Limestone Run. At the time of which we write, owing to several heavy rains, it had become quite swollen; and to this stream, by a circuitous way, was it that Mrs. Delmont set out with creditable speed. Her errand to the said stream can only be surmised, when we state that the next day a large party of neighbors who had been out on a search for the missing girl, led on by the apparently nearly distracted Uncle Eben, discovered a bonnet recognized as Susie's; and a shoe near the edge of the water that belonged to her, together with a blotted note apparently in her hand-writing, were found on the bank. The stream was dragged, but the body of the unfortunate Susie was not found; yet there was not one in the neighborhood (the Delmonts excepted) who had the slightest doubt but that Susie Delmont was drowned.

In due time Charles Maynard came into possession of the property, and then it was Mrs. Delmont and Angeline began their plotting and planning in earnest.

"O, mother!"

Angeline quite startled that lady with her ejaculation; but unheeding this, the young lady threw herself into a chair quite breathless with excitement, fanning herself industriously with her gipsy hat.

"Mother!"

"Well?"

"Charlie Maynard has proposed, at last!"

Mrs. Delmont dropped the apple she was paring, and looked up with surprise and delight depicted upon her countenance.

"How in the world did it happen, Angeline?" she asked, at length.

"Well, I'll tell you," replied the daughter; "it took considerable management on my part, but I succeeded. I'm glad now I bought that velvet and bugle lace. I always shall believe that they had something to do with catching Charlie Maynard, for they do set the basque out finely—don't they?" And Angeline gazed down upon her dress with an admiring eye.

"Yes, but about the proposition—tell me about that!" interrupted Mrs. Delmont, impatiently.

"Well I will, then. You see I asked him why he did not marry—"

"A bold question."

"Yes, I know; but he did not appear to notice it, but said he had long thought of marrying—that there was a certain fair lady who possessed all his affections—a lady beautiful and accomplished, and all that—and then he looked at me so lovingly and admiringly, that I felt that the battle was more than half won."

"And what did you say?" asked Mrs. Delmont, anxiously.

"O, I said: 'Indeed, Charlie! and pray why don't you marry her?'"

"If I can gain her consent, I will most gladly," he said, and then was silent. I saw he was kind of diffident, so I looked as innocent as you please.

"And what is her name, Charlie?"

"He looked at me straight in the eyes, and said 'Can you not guess?' And then he asked me how I should like to change my name to Maynard, and if I would have any objection to having a wedding here in a week or ten days."

"And you?"

"Why I—of course I consented; and the wedding day is to be a week from Thursday, and we'll have such a grand wedding party—wont we?"

Angeline clapped her hands, and sat down to make out a list of guests to be invited, and to comment upon the subject of laces, silks, white gloves and satin slippers; while Charlie Maynard, in his own room, sat down to a table and wrote a long letter, which having folded, enveloped and superscribed, he sealed and placed in his coat pocket ready to mail the following morning. This letter was received, one pleasant summer evening, by a young lady known by the teachers and pupils of a certain excellent institute as Miss Susie Delmont—the said young lady smiling quietly, as she read the letter. Susie was meditating revenge.

Yes, that tall, elegant woman, with that crown of purple and black braided bands of glossy hair, that noble brow, those sparkling, soul-lit eyes, that firm, proud, womanly mouth, and that voice of surpassing sweetness, as she warbled a simple song—that was our little friend Susan of six years previous. Are you astonished, reader? The explanation is very simple, and easily made. Charlie Maynard had incurred the expense of her education, and when he said, "Susie, will you marry a poor man who loves you?" it was love, and not gratitude that prompted the reply: "My heart wholly belongs to you, Charles Maynard." And as the young man folded the beautiful girl to his bosom, he thanked Heaven for having given him so great a blessing.

The Delmont cottage was thrown open to the accommodation of a large number of guests, the élite of the country round. Young men and maidens, old men and matrons, filled the tasteful parlors, and all was expectation, for that evening (so report ran) Angeline Delmont was to become Mrs. Maynard; and it is due the handsome and talented Dr. Maynard to say that many were the fair maids who envied the intriguing Angeline her husband, as well as the fortune accompanying that article.

Angeline was in her room, arrayed for the bridal. To tell the truth, she looked very pretty in the midst of her satin and laces; yet there was a shadow upon her brow, and she looked ill pleased, for the bridegroom had not arrived, and the time had come for the ceremony to begin.

"There, he's come!" exclaimed Mrs. Delmont, who had watched every arrival eagerly. "And there is another couple with him—Mr. Whitman and a lady. I suppose they are bridesmaid and groomsman, though I think, my dear Angeline, it is a lady's place to choose her own bridesmaid."

"All ready!" Mr. Whitman offered his arm to Miss Angeline, who wondered vastly what it could mean, and why Charles should escort the strange lady; but supposing it was city fashion, and not caring to show her ignorance, she proceeded.

Of course, all happened as it was intended by Charles Maynard, and Miss Angeline was but a bridesmaid, after all.

"What does this mean?" gasped Aunt Esther, as the ceremony was about to commence.

"Villain!" hissed Miss Angeline.

"What are you about?" abruptly inquired Uncle Eben.

"Silence!" demanded Charles Maynard. "You shall all know soon; the time of explanation has come, or nearly so. Let the ceremony go on! Proceed!"

There was so much of sternness and command in his tone, no objection was raised, and a few moments sufficed to make Charles Maynard and Susie Delmont man and wife.

"Susie Delmont!" cried Aunt Esther.

"Susan Delmont!" stammered the almost fainting Angeline; while Uncle Eben exclaimed, his voice rising above all others:

"There, wife, that's just what I've always told you! You've played a game, a desperate bad one, and you're beat. Susan Delmont aint dead, and Maynard's gone and married her. We're all in the mire now, head over ears."

And so they were truly; and when Charles Maynard began and told the whole story of deception from beginning to end, they gave themselves up for lost—going down, down, down! Angeline fainted, Mrs. Delmont went into most violent hysterics, while Uncle Eben, the tears dashing over his ruddy, sun-browned cheeks, exclaimed:

"Served us all right! God bless you, Maynard—you and Susie! She's a good gal, and was poor Henry's darter. Forgive your old uncle! He never gave ye a hard word, Susie, did he? with all his faults."

Uncle Eben carries on the farm, and Aunt Esther is housekeeper at the cottage, glad of the home thus offered to them. As for Angeline, she is still unmarried, and probably will be for some time to come, despite black velvet and bugle lace. She teaches school for a support, and—need we add Charles and Susie are very happy?

Susie Delmont had her triumph, and her revenge was in returning good for evil, and smoothing the rough path of declining life for those who had rendered her childhood miserable! Heaven bless you, Susie!

—♦♦♦— EVENING.

An eve intensely beautiful—an eve
Calm as the summer of a lovely girl
Dreaming of hope. The rich autumnal woods,
With their innumerable shades and colorings,
Are like a silent instrument at rest—
A silent instrument, whereon the wind
Hath long forgot to play.—HOUMAN.

LOUIS HUNTER'S TRIALS.

BY M. A. AVERY.

THE evening was cold and dreary; the snow falling in fine, sleety flakes, and the wind howling around that old-fashioned dwelling, and singing through all its cracks and crevices; but little cared its inmates for that, as they sat cheerily around the bright-blazing fire of the pleasant sitting-room, laughing and chatting, or reading or working, as best suited their several fancies; and the eyes of the full moon that looked down from the old brass-wheeled clock in the corner, beheld a very pleasant family party.

The portly old squire, in his great armchair, had gone off into the land of dreams in one corner, while his worthy lady, for the honor of the family, redoubled her diligence, and snapped her knitting-needles vigorously, to make up for his laziness, and keep pace with the needles and tongue of Mrs. Glenn, a gossiping visitor, who was now favoring the neighborhood generally with one of her protracted calls, and at this hour, the Haydens in particular, with the retail business of her calling. Mrs. Hayden looked grave, and was generally silent, though her guest's tongue ran incessantly. Miss Jane, a haughty but handsome young lady of twenty, looked up from her embroidery occasionally, with a glance of mingled pleasure, doubt and irony, while Alda, a girl of sixteen, and her schoolmate and casual visitor, Ellen Lee, who were vainly trying to look out their lessons for the ensuing day, listened with eager interest and delight. Johnny, meantime, the pet and only son of the family, was busy cracking nuts upon the hearth beside his mother. Tray the large house-dog lay sleeping beside his master. The old Maltese cat purred cosily over her pet baby upon the rug, the fire flashed and glowed and sparkled, and the scene altogether presented a very pretty picture of domestic enjoyment.

"Well, how do you here like Louis Hunter the young schoolmaster?" asked Mrs. Glenn, as she glanced around the pleasant group, after many other subjects were exhausted.

"Very much, I believe," Mrs. Hayden replied. "He seems to be an uncommonly bright, intelligent, talented young man for one of his age—what they say is only twenty."

"Indeed!—well, I'm raly glad somebody has a good opinion of the feller."

"Why so? Don't he bear a good name with everybody?"

"Well, I dunno. I raly wish the boy well, but it's a pity they are so poor and mean and drunken."

"His relations mean? Why, I knew his old grandfather well when I lived at my uncle's, and a nobler, better man never existed. His son, this Louis's father, was away in the city then; and I have heard that after his father's death he took to drinking, and spent nearly all that his father had given him, which is certainly very unfortunate for his family, though nothing against them personally."

"Of course not, Mrs. Hayden. But do these young ladies like this young chap as well, or better than their mother?" And she peered at them over the rims of her iron-bowed spectacles with a queer glance of suspicious inquiry.

"Ask Alda there, who likes him," said Ellen Lee, with a gay laugh.

The pretty face of Alda Hayden crimsoned under the gaze of so many eyes as were now fixed upon her, and feeling angry to know that it did, she said shortly:

"I think it looks very suspicious that you should be so ready to make a cloak of other people."

"Take care, Alda," said the gay Ellen, "or I shall tell these good people about the loved-lit glances I have detected at school this winter. You'd better believe, Mrs. Glenn, that Cupid's arrows have been flying around the school-house like a discharge of musketry."

"And that one Ellen Lee was among the wounded," retorted Alda.

"If I am, the arrow that struck me was not from the same quiver as the one that pierced your tender heart," laughed Ellen.

"What's all this nonsense about, foolish girls?" said Mrs. Hayden, contemptuously. "Nothing sounds more silly and disgusting than for little chicks like you, with the egg-shells still clinging to their backs, to be talking about hearts and darts, and lovers and husbands."

"Ay, but many a girl has had a husband before she was as old as these young ladies," suggested Mrs. Glenn.

"Yes, Mrs. Glenn, but the more fool she, or her friends, if she had any. There's time enough for all those things when girls have finished their education and learned housekeeping, and boys found some business to support them. And they'd all be better off, in my opinion, to wait till they are twenty-five, at least."

"Look out sharp for your young misses then, if that is your idea, or the first you'll know, they'll be running away with some tin pedler, or young schoolmaster."

Mrs. Hayden looked up with a quick, suspicious glance at Mrs. Glenn, and then at her daughters, the eldest of whom met her glance with a calm but slightly contemptuous one, and then both turned their eyes upon the conscious Alda, who all at once seemed deeply absorbed in her studies, though her flitting color convinced them that her interest in them was feigned.

"I wonder you will be putting such ideas as those into foolish girls' heads," said Miss Jane, who, in truth was privately engaged already. "Why, after this I shall be looking for a husband upon the top of every tin pedler's cart I meet, Mrs. Glenn."

"And Alda will be after every young school-master, I s'pose," chuckled that worthy lady. "But take care, Alda, and see that your charmer has a decent character. You're too proud to have a feller who has a drunkard for a father, and an infinitely worse character for a mother, like this Louis Hunter, besides being no better than he ought to be himself."

"Indeed! But are you sure they are really such a disreputable set?" asked Mrs. Hayden.

"You must be badly posted in county biography, if you do not know it," said the woman, with a gratified smile. "But the worst of it in my opinion is, that this fellow should begin so young to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessors."

"But does any one really know such to be the case?"

"Such reports are in circulation, any way—but pray don't mention them from me. I wouldn't harm the young man for the world; and as his school is so nearly out, perhaps it would be as well to say nothing about them around here."

"Certainly. Don't mention them, girls, any of you. But do you suppose it really true that his mother was a bad character?"

"It certainly is, if one can credit reports that have been in circulation ever since she came to Charleroy. It is even said that jealousy and domestic disappointment were the cause of the husband's ruin; and that but for the children, who were born before they came there, he would have left her long ago. Of one thing I am certain, for I have friends near them—no one of any respectability has anything to do with her, and they would have left the place long ago, if David Hunter had had spirit enough left for anything."

Bird of ill omen, thy mission is accomplished! In revenge for a fancied wrong, from the husband, thou hast slandered a loving and innocent wife—brought jealousy and wretchedness into a happy family—and now disgraced the son, and planted thorns in young and innocent hearts, that but for thee would be nursing with tender care the beautiful flowers of love and hope, before so fondly cherished!

For it was indeed but the truth that Alda Hayden felt more than a common interest in the young teacher, though it had never before been suspected by her own family. And to him the long, dreary winter had flown by on swift wings, so absorbed was he in love's first fond dream—a dream that had made that old school-house seem like a fairy palace, because her smiles brightened and her beautiful eyes lightened its dinginess; that had made all onerous duties pleasant, and added a charm to their performance, withdrawn his thoughts from the real troubles of his existence, and cast such a warm and radiant glow over his dim and darkened prospects for the future, as to make him forget, for the time, the real and actual in the ideal.

But this beautiful dream was destined to a rude awakening; and he was now to learn that aristocratic pride and fear of the world's opinion, were some of the characteristics of the divinity he had worshipped, and that the copy he had so often set, that "Change and alteration form the very essence of the world," was something more than idle words.

As Mrs. Hayden had said, Louis Hunter was a talented and remarkably promising young man, whatever might be said of his relatives, and the hints to his disadvantage the old lady had thrown out, were no more true than her own deceitful heart and scheming brain. His father, it was true, was one who did not make his home a paradise; but whatever others might say or think, no one could make him believe that his mother was much lower than the angels. They had a home, a little brown cot, the wreck of his grandfather's property, and by dint of industry and perseverance, Louis had contrived to secure a good English education, and he was now striving earnestly to obtain the means that would procure a more classical one and a profession.

Such had been his plan; but getting in love was rather a poor beginning, in his circumstances, for the years of toil that were before him—though he thought they were both so young they could afford to wait till success had crowned his efforts, and he might have a better title to win the prize he coveted. But as yet he had only thought and dreamed, as a thousand others have done, without making those dreams known to their object in words. But from the day of Mrs. Glenn's visit to the family, he could not help seeing that a change had come over the fair Alda Hayden. The mute eloquence of lip and eye, of glance and smile, were gone, or at least no longer responded to his own. Her head was raised with a look of haughty pride, her eyes downcast, or looking anywhere else than at him, and her mood among her mates much more gay and boisterous than he had ever seen it before, while he knew that she studiously avoided him, in every way.

He wondered at the cause and lamented the change, but he could not, like her, affect a gayety he did not feel. Each day he grew more pale, languid and gloomy, as the school drew near its close. The old ladies where he boarded grew alarmed and tried to dose him with catnip and thoroughwort, and the young ones sighed and looked pitiful, though he, poor fellow, would confess to no ailment but the bad effects of the close air of the hot school-room. Concluding at last that he had offended the young lady, he resolved to seek for an explanation, but while waiting for a convenient opportunity, he found reason for changing his mind.

It was at recess of a fine March day, when the scholars were all out at play, that he returned from a walk, and was just hanging up his hat, when he saw Alda and Ellen glance by the window and come into the entry-door.

"I wonder if Mr. Hunter has returned?" he heard Ellen say, as she looked into the school-room, but without seeing him, he stood so near the door and the wall. "No, he has not," she continued.

"That's lucky," said Alda, "for now we can sit down here and sun ourselves without interruption from any one."

"How long is it, pray, since you began to consider Louis Hunter's society such a bother," laughed Ellen. "It seems to me we both used to like it pretty well."

"Perhaps you did, Ellen."

"Certainly. But you needn't try to blind me, Alda, for I know the day, the hour, and the person who told us his character, and opened your eyes to your true feelings. We have never talked of this before, but I tell you now, Alda, that I don't believe Aunt Huldah's insinuations. His father may be a drunkard, and his mother a low character, but I don't believe it of him."

"Well, if they are so mean, to say nothing of him, is it not enough to draw an impassable line of separation between us? I think so, if you do not. Just think how we should look and feel associating with the Banhams, who are no meaner, from Aunt Huldah's description, than these Huns," said Alda, earnestly.

"Alda, Henry Banham is handsome and talented, in spite of his connexions, and if I loved him and he me, as well as I thought you and Hunter loved each other, I could overlook the meanness of his family."

"So, you thought I loved Hunter, did you?" said she, scornfully. "Assure yourself, then, that I shall never break my heart for him. I have too much pride for that, let me tell you."

"But you once liked his society, Alda, I know you did."

"I confess it; and I am now heartily ashamed of it, and if it wasn't for people's remarks, I wouldn't come to school now, I so dread to meet the pleading glance of his eyes."

"You fear your own weakness more, Alda. You are as proud as Lucifer, and so are your folks at home, but that pride is leading you to do what you will bitterly regret some day—see if you don't!—But let's go in and get our seats before Hunter comes."

They walked slowly in, accordingly, and facing round as they were about to sit down, the first object they beheld was Louis Hunter, with a face as pale as death, one hand clutching the desk, as if for support, and the other pressed to his heart, as if to stifle its shame, indignation and agony. He looked up—a flood of crimson swept over his face, that told as plainly as words that he had been a listener to every ill-starred word, and flashing a glance of mingled contempt and scorn upon Alda Hayden, he turned to the window, and gave the signal for school to commence. Not a word was spoken, and from that hour, not a look or tone of his revealed to Alda, or any one else, a trace of the wild struggle between pride and love that was going on in his heart. He was gayer, wittier, and more eloquent and fascinating than he had ever been before, and when he left at the end of the school, he took with him proud Alda's heart. Years passed away, but she never forgot that dream of early love, and though she wished it a thousand times, he never came back to her—though she did not wholly give up all hope of ever seeing him again, till she heard that he had gone South or West, a thousand miles or more away.

And other changes came to Alda Hayden. She removed to the city to live with a maiden aunt, for whom she was named, acquired many accomplishments, became a brilliant and popular belle, and at her aunt's death, was left sole mistress of a large fortune. A desire for change and a roving life now came upon her; and joining a party of friends, she went to Niagara and the lakes, and down the Ohio and Mississippi to New Orleans, visiting all the principal cities and places of interest on the way, and making a long-promised visit to a school-girl friend at the end of the journey.

And there, for the first time in ten years, she met Louis Hunter, the object of her early love, the victim of her haughty pride. He was now a distinguished and popular man, and had recently filled the highest office in the gift of the people, in a more northern State. They knew each other instantly, though change had set the signet of a cultivated intellect and a maturer beauty upon the noble brows of both. But both were too proud to acknowledge an acquaintance fraught with such bitter remembrances, and they met as perfect strangers.

But fate, that sometimes so curiously and strangely tangles and commingles the threads of human destiny, willed that they should see much of each other during that eventful winter. Both were visiting in the same family, and of course a daily and hourly intercourse was unavoidable. At first, both were frigid and distant as politeness would allow, and her friend Anna Leigh wondered what could make her own and her father's guests so much afraid of each other. But there were times when looks and words and tones revived early and tender memories, and the hearts of both gathered fuel for a purer and more lasting flame. Each was surprised, as well as the high position, as the growth of intellect in the other, and the similarity of all their discovered tastes and sentiments—though a kind of antagonism, born of regret and pride, kept them from all familiar intercourse. But in spite of this, the old love revived with a tenfold power in the hearts of both, though both were for a long time too proud to confess it, even to themselves. Both were exceedingly popular in society, and always surrounded by admirers; but though they jealously watched each other, neither could discover the mystery of the other's preferences.

But the time of parting drew near. He had doubted and resolved, and put off a declaration till the last moment, in the hope of receiving some acknowledgment, or seeing some symptoms of a preference she had studiously concealed; and now her name was booked for the next northern steamer. The evening before her intended departure, Alda and Louis, with Anna and her lover, were out for a walk—the last they expected to take together in the beautiful grounds that surrounded Mr. Leigh's house. The sky was flecked with crimson and gold-tipped clouds, the breeze blew soft and cool from the river, the early flowers of spring were blooming around them; but it was not of these that they thought, as Louis and Alda walked silently on in advance of their companions. They stopped at last, in the mouth of a little arbor, covered by thick vines and shadowed by a dense tropical foliage, to wait for the coming up of their friends.

"You are very sad and thoughtful to-night,

Miss Hayden," he said. "Is it because you are so soon to leave us?"

"That may have its influences," she replied, with a deeply regretful look and tone.

"Perhaps there is a deeper cause. Report says you have a heart and the promise of a hand with one of these gay southerners." And he looked searchingly into her face for a reply.

"That is untrue," she replied, blushing. "I have never seen the southerner, gallant and chivalrous as they surely are, who could win those precious gifts from me."

"Some one at the North, then—perhaps they were promised before you came among us!" he said, questioningly.

"No, Mr. Hunter, I am under no obligation to North, South, East or West, and—never expect to be," said she, bitterly.

"Why do you say that, Miss Hayden?"

To his extreme surprise, she uttered a loud shriek at this instant, and threw herself upon his bosom. He looked up only in time to see a glittering poignard sheathed in the quivering shoulder that shielded his heart! It was too dark to distinguish the color of the grim hand that guided the weapon, but Anna and her friend, who were summoned by her piercing shriek, saw a dark, muffled figure, supposed to be one of Alda's disappointed admirers, glide swiftly away from the spot. Alda fainted with fright and terror; but she soon revived enough to say that she saw the hand, with the weapon pointed at his heart, protruding through the thick vines, only in time to do as she had done. And though her wound was severe, she was not sorry thus to be the means of saving a human life.

Louis was deeply affected by this act of apparent devotion, and as soon as they were alone together, he said, as he took her hand:

"Words are too poor to express the deep love I have long felt for you, Miss Hayden, or the gratitude that now swells my heart for the noble and generous act that saved my life. O what can I ever do," he continued, with deep emotion, "to repay such an act of rare philanthropy and self-sacrifice?"

"Forgive the deep wrong of the thoughtless words I once uttered in our early days, Louis Hunter—when pride and evil counsels made me untrue to every feeling of my heart," sobbed Alda, who till now, had maintained the appearance of cold, proud indifference, but who drew her to his heart, sobbed out tears of penitence and joy for his recovered affection, upon his manly bosom.

"Do you indeed regret the past, and return the love I then felt, and still feel for you?" he asked.

"I did, and do, Louis—but am I forgiven?"

"Forgiven! O, Alda, one word of regret, or remembrance even, would have brought me back to you, through all this long winter that I have waited so vainly for one word, or smile of recognition or favor. It is true, that listening to the counsels of pride, I at first resolved to shun, and to have nothing more to do with you, but in the heaven of your presence, those resolutions melted like snow in the midday sun, and long before your preparations for departure, I had planned, if you favored no one else, to ask you to become my wife. And I was about to do so, in doubt and fear for the result, when your noble act of self-devotion, which so nearly cost you your life, proved to me beyond a doubt that you really cared for me. Did it prove more than the truth, dear Alda?"

"No, no," said Alda, blushing, "and though I did it from the impulse of the moment, I believe I could not thus have risked my life for one I did not love."

When Alda's wound was healed, she went home in the Northerner—not as plain Alda Hayden though, but Ex-Governor Hunter's bride. And now, her friends were not at all mortified by the connexion, nor was she ashamed of the slandered but still noble mother, or the respectable father, redeemed through the influence of his noble son, to whom that son presented her.

After a pleasant visit to all their friends, as well as to the old school-house, and every dear and well-remembered spot, they returned to Louis Hunter's adopted home, where they still live, happy in their mutual love, and the respect and affection of all around them.

BABY OUTDONE.

Sir George Davis, who was English consul at Naples when a great plague raged there, retired in consequence to Florence. Visiting one day the menagerie of the grand duke, he noticed a lion at the further end of one of the dens, which the keepers stated they had been unable to tame, though every effort had been made for upwards of three years. Yet no sooner had Sir George reached the gate of the den, than the lion ran to it, reared himself up, purred like a cat when pleased, and licked the hand that was put through the bars. The keeper was astonished, and, frightened for the safety of his visitor, entreated him not to trust an apparent fit of frenzy, as the lion was the most fierce and sullen of his tribe he had ever seen. This, however, had no effect on Sir George, who insisted on entering the lion's den. The moment he got in, the lion manifested the greatest delight, threw his paws on his shoulders, licked his face, ran about him, and purred like an affectionate cat. This occurrence became the talk of Florence, and reached the ears of the grand duke, who sent for Sir George, and requested an interview at the menagerie, that he might personally witness the conduct of the lion.

"HERE COMES BOBTAIL."

The following is related of Judge Peters, of Pennsylvania: When General Lafayette was on his last visit to this country, Independence Hall, in the State House at Philadelphia was opened, in order that the public might have a chance to shake hands with the friend of Washington. Judge Peters being one of the committee to introduce the "great unwashed," there was a circle formed, on one side of which stood the general and the judge; those wishing to be introduced being obliged to walk across from the opposite side, and after paying their respects, retire to make way for others. One individual, who, from his manner, evidently thought it the most important event of his life, being dressed within an inch thereof—was seen elbowing his way through the dense mass congregated near the door, and the pressure took off his coat-tails, leaving nothing but the body of his otherwise faultless dress-coat. In his excitement, he knew nothing of his loss; but having gained the front of the circle, he strode across the vacant space with the air of a man who thinks he is creating a sensation. And you'd better believe he thought right; for the moment the judge saw him coming, he turned to the general, saying: "I have introduced you to Rag and Tag, now here comes Bobtail!"—Pennsylvania Herald.

LYING IN BED.

It is often a question amongst people who are unacquainted with the anatomy and physiology of man, whether lying with the head exalted or level with the body was the most wholesome. Most, consulting their own ease on this point, argue in favor of that which they prefer. Now, although many delight in bolstering up their heads at night, and sleep soundly without injury, yet, we declare it to be a dangerous habit. The vessels through which the blood passes from the heart to the head are always lessened in their cavities when the head is resting in bed higher than the body; therefore, in all diseases attended with fever, the head should be pretty nearly on a level with the body; and people ought to accustom themselves to sleep thus, and avoid danger.—Medical Journal.

WHY ARE THE PRAIRIES TREELESS?

The Westerners, when they speculate on geology, answer this question by affirming that the prairie fires have burnt them all off—that they have been frightened out of existence by the fires of the Indians. At other times they vary their theory by affirming that the absence of trees is due to the deficiency of rain; but neither does this stand examination, for the maps of the distribution of rain show that the fall on the prairies about equals that in other regions. Mr. Whitney, in his paper on the Origin of the Prairies, read before the Scientific Congress, shows that the real cause of the absence of arborescent vegetation lies in certain mechanical conditions of the soil, and in its extreme fineness.—Western Paper.

POPULAR OPINION.

The people,
Against their nature, are all bent for him;
And, like a field of standing corn that's mowed
With a stiff gale, their heads bow all one way.

YOU AND I.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

The fields are yellow with the grain,
The autumn skies shed gentle rain;
My heart returns in hope again,
To where beneath such skies we trod,
When first you pointed me to God.

Your music lingers sweetly still;
Its echoes reach beyond the hill,
Where then you bent my stubborn will,
And whispered of the nobler life
Undimmed by scenes of earthly strife.

I wonder if the years far on
Will prove my soul indeed new born;
If through life's lowering clouds forlorn
I shall have passed unchanged, and be
A witness for my God and thee.

If so, 'neath skies of brighter hue
I once shall stand, and there with you
Read clearly all this mystery through;
Why hearts akin like ours should prove Unblessed on earth by nearer love.

IN AT THE DEATH!

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

WITH horses, horns and hounds, with hearts eager for the chase, and upon a most delightful morning, we all assembled on the lawn of my uncle's country house, a merry and jovial hunting party as ever was seen in all the length and breadth of Merrie England.

I need not specify particularly whom the we is meant to include, although perhaps one or two should receive a brief notice. There was, then, first, my uncle, a bold, bluff fox-hunter, who really, I think, thought the sport the only occupation fit to engross the serious attention of Christians; there was Harry Merlin, good-looking as ever, but between whom and myself—very unaccountably, considering that we were fellow-collegians, and had hitherto borne the closest relations of intimacy with each other—there was upon this particular morning, a marked coolness; and then there was Belle Catherwood.

Ah! but she deserves a more extended mention. Charming, brilliant Belle Catherwood—as beautiful a girl of twenty as ever scattered an impudent young man's self-assurance to the four winds—how shall I hope to describe her? I might speak of black hair and eyes, of bewitching smiles, of saucy laughs, and all that sort of thing, and Belle would not even thus be perfectly delineated. To be brief, she was a frank, great-hearted young lady, who loved to fish and hunt, and who did break all the masculine hearts within a circuit of ten good English leagues, whether she loved to do it or not.

She was an Amazon, was Belle—and not a straw did she care who knew it. No conventionalist, I fancy, would have chosen her as a pattern of maidenly propriety and behaviour, and little did the young lady desire to assume that position. She, forsooth! Have I not seen her more than once, flying over the fences upon her black imp of a horse, while the worthy curate beheld her from afar off, and lifted up his eyes—ay, and his hands too, in blank horror at the sight? And has not the crack of her rifle from the woods, aroused me from my slumbers times innumerable!

I was present, too, this morning, extremely anxious to hunt the hare—or perhaps some larger game, as will appear by-and-by. We were all assembled there ready for the start, and my uncle proceeded to give us some preparatory advice.

"Attend to me for a moment, my young masters," he said, addressing himself directly to Harry and me. "We are going to hunt this morning, and to hunt hares. You may have seen a hare in the course of the few years' experience you've had on earth?"

Harry looked cross and indignant, and I grumbled out something to the effect that "I wasn't quite a fool yet."

"Ah, glad to hear it," the malicious old scamp continued. "Well, now I wish merely to advise you to give all your attention to the chase, and to remember that we are to hunt hares, and not young ladies."

A musical "ha, ha," rilled out from between Belle's red lips, as she heard this sly shot.

"Me, you mean, I suppose," she said. "Why, how silly to think that either of them could chase me with any hope of catching me! Haven't I hunted with them both many and many a time, and which of them ever overtook me? I'd be willing to give the one who overtook me in the hunt, what both have asked me for a dozen times."

At the words, she drew off her riding-glove, and shook her plump, white hand, sparkling with rings, saucily towards us. Harry and I both sprang to her horse's side, and laid eager hold on the bridle.

"Do you speak earnestly, Belle?" we asked, in the same breath. There was a slight blush upon her face, and she became somewhat embarrassed, as she saw our eager promptness, but recovering her self-possession, she said, carelessly:

"Earnestly? Of course I do, and safe enough am I in making the offer. And now, help me to the saddle, and I'll lead you a long, hard gallop."

I was nearest to her, and offered my assistance first; but she coquettishly refused it, and accepted Harry's. I felt sick, angry, jealous—I couldn't help it—and I sprang upon my horse with a desperate vigor which almost carried me to the other side. As we all rode forward, I dropped behind and signed Harry to join me.

"You'll be willing to abide by the event?" I asked.

"Yes—whoever is blessed or cursed by this venture, I'll abide by it! And you—"

"I will, so help me—Belle Catherwood!"

And we rode forward and took our positions upon either side of her—two as determined, obstinate fellows, as ever entered their energies for a trial where the stake was a heart. My heart thumped fearfully as I looked at Belle, and reflected that I might lose. Lose! Perdition—how could I? "No, and by the powers, I won't!" was my mental conclusion. And secretly invoking Diana to my aid, I braced my feet tighter in the stirrups. Belle must have known with what eagerness we were looking at her, and with what fury at each other, for her eyes were downcast, and she was switching nervously at her riding-dress. The hounds had been loosened some moments before, and we were waiting for the signal.

"Hark!" said my uncle, checking his horse. We listened, and the deep baying of the dogs came distinctly to our ears. We were, at this instant, within a rod of a high stone wall—and as Belle heard the sound, she breasted her horse to it, and carried him gallantly over with a slight stroke of the whip, her eyes gleaming with the excitement of the chase, and her mocking laugh floating back to us. That was a feat which Miss Belle, with her fiery black charger might accomplish, but which the rest of us must needs have a start to perform, and so, retiring several rods, we made a rush, and carried the wall together, in a line, starting completely abreast. But this position was not long maintained.

"Now for it," I muttered. And loosening my rein, I bent my knees to the saddle and set my teeth together. But first, a glance at the field. I had comprehended the position of things before I touched the ground after the leap. A long, level country lay before us, unbroken, so far as I could discover, save by occasional fences and ditches, of no importance to the trained hunters which we rode. The hounds were in full cry just half a mile in advance, running in a long, straggling line, and Belle, leading the whole company by at least half that distance, was apparently increasing the gap at every stride. Heavens! how gloriously she looked! In fact, I almost stopped to admire her. Her riding-cap had fallen from her head in the heat of the chase, and her dark ringlets blew back over her shoulders in a thick mass, while her closely-fitting riding-habit displayed, even at the distance she had gained, every curve of her perfect form. And how like a born huntress she held her gallant steed to his stride, altering his course at times to follow the doublings of the game, and now and then touching him lightly with the whip! Occasionally, too, she turned gracefully in the saddle, and looked back to note our progress, accompanying the movement usually with a shout of exultation, and a wave of her little hand—that hand which, rather than the game, Harry and I were pursuing!

And how we did ride—my head fairly reels to think of that mad gallop! The first half-dozen bounds carried us ahead of all save my uncle, and at the end of the field we passed him also—first, Harry, who yelled in his ear as he went by, some advice, to the effect that he might profitably go home and learn how to hunt hares, and then myself, respectfully snapping my fingers in his face, till, as I threw a glance back, I saw that the old fellow was alternately shaking his riding-whip at us, and then laying it on his horse.

But no more looking back after that—forward was the word—victory and Belle Catherwood, or a broken neck! What a struggle, what a race was that! My blood tingles again at the thought! With breaths drawn hard, eyes fixed upon the figure of Belle, and reins slackened—half the time lying loose upon the horses' necks—we conformed all our movements to those of the game—beg pardon, Belle—and swept onward like a whirlwind. For the first fifteen minutes it was doubtful who was likely to gain the permanent lead. At the first brush, after passing my uncle, Harry led me by a length. Then I passed him, and led him two; but his whip cracked over the flanks of his horse half a dozen times like a pistol, and the gap was overcome. And now came the fury of the struggle. Head and head, neck and neck, we careered onward, neither gaining more than half a length, nor keeping it when gained longer than three seconds. Never did Epsom or Derby jockeys ride better for the sweepstakes, than did we for Belle Catherwood; the trees and fences reeled by till I found the impression fast gaining upon my mind, that the whole country was indulging in a spree, in honor of the occasion, and fence after fence, ditch after ditch, was leaped in our mad course, side by side.

The whole field was now distanced, my uncle and the balance of his guests being "nowhere," and still Harry and I held on. Of course, with such headlong speed as this, the distance which Belle had gained had been materially diminished. She was now perhaps forty yards in the lead, but her speed had not diminished in the slightest. At the start I flattered myself that I was better mounted than Harry, for the stride of my horse was certainly more even than that of his, but I now began to discover with alarm my mistake. The hunter which my uncle had assigned to me was perhaps the better trained of the two, but he now began to show symptoms of distress, while Harry's was apparently as fresh as ever. The speed of my animal flagged, and Harry worked sensibly ahead, until he was half-way between Belle and myself, and I dropping behind every moment! I could not encourage my hunter to greater speed—he had reached his greatest, and was now relaxing to his medium gait. With a sinking heart, I urged him on to what seemed certain defeat—when an event occurred which materially altered the aspect of affairs.

Hitherto, with the exception of the wall encountered at the very outset, we had met with no serious obstacles—all the ditches and fences in our way had been cleared with hardly an effort. But now an impediment rose before us, which was to test our nerve, and the powers of our horses to the utmost. It was one of those gigantic hedges which proprietors in England sometimes cultivate between their estates—full nine feet high, perhaps three feet thick, and bristling with the bayonet-points of thorny vines. At first sight of it, Belle drew up, and Harry dashed forward exultingly, evidently thinking his prize secure. Not at all. The lady has merely paused to give her horse a single breath, and measuring the extent of the hedge with her eagle eye, and satisfying herself that there is no gap large enough for her to break through, she makes a desperate rush towards it! I was in no situation to pause, every second of time was golden to me now, and with whip and spur I urged my horse to the hedge. I saw that the prospect made him uneasy, and that he evinced a decided propensity to bolt, but holding him with a steady hand, I drove him madly on. The prospect of that leap was truly frightful, and a stouter heart than mine might well have quailed at it, but I was almost crazed with excitement, and I was determined that if Belle Catherwood took that hedge, I would follow her, though the certainty of a broken neck lay beyond!

And take it she did, as bravely as hedge was ever cleared. Harry was hardly two lengths behind her, and I not more than six—and now came my triumph! I saw his cheek pale as he drew near to it, his lip trembled, and drawing his rein with a jerk which threw his horse back upon his haunches, he turned abruptly, and looked anxiously around. I came on at full gallop—the hedge was reached—and vigorously plying whip and spur, with a shout of derision for Harry, I lifted my hunter to the dizzy leap. He cleared it, barely touching the inner top; and with a shock which knocked the breath out of my body, and me from the saddle, we struck the ground upon the other side. A sense of dizziness, changing to nausea, at first oppressed me, as I found myself lying helplessly upon my back. Pains—sharp, acute, thrilling pains, seemed to traverse every nerve of my body, and I feebly opened my eyes. The hunt was ended—the hounds were gathered into a knot close by, mangle the dead hare—and Belle was just recovering from the shock of that fearful leap, which had injured neither herself nor her horse, sufficiently to look about her. She saw me, as I lay motionless by the side of my poor hunter, who for some reason was unable to rise, and with an exclamation of alarm, she sprang from her saddle and hastened towards me. My eyes were closed in an instant. Soon she was kneeling by my side, pressing her handkerchief, which she had wet in a brook close by, to my forehead. I betrayed no sign of consciousness—at least, I endeavored not to—and the next instant my head was resting in Belle's lap, and she was wringing her hands over me and sobbing like a child.

"Will, dear Will," she cried, "do open your eyes and speak to me! O, Will, you won't die—but your face is so white! Look up, Will, and speak—it is I, Belle Catherwood!"

I thought best to comply, and so my eyes slowly opened. Belle gave an exclamation of joy:

"Are you much hurt, Will, darling?" she asked, tenderly, bending down until her breath swept across my face.

"I can hardly tell," was my feeble reply, "but I am moderately sure that my arm is broken, and two or three of my ribs, besides which, I am bruised almost to a jelly."

"But you'll live, thank God! You'll not die, Will?"

"I can't tell," I answered, very seriously. "It will depend very much upon what answer you make to two or three questions which I am about to ask you." Belle opened her great eyes wide with wonder.

"In the first place, I suppose you would do almost anything for me, just now. Would you, Belle?"

"Only ask it, Will. What shall I do?"

"Put your arms around my neck, and kiss me!" I resolutely replied. "Do it," I threatened, seeing that she hesitated in confusion, "do it, or I'll die in less than three minutes!"

And she did it—sweetly, tenderly, blushing. The first kiss from her we love—reader, do you recall it? Its thrill, its ecstasy might last for years, and remain undiminished. At all events, I fancied that I improved wonderfully under its operation in this instance.*

"Now, Belle Catherwood, tell me that you love me! Don't hesitate—say yes, or good-bye to me. I can live or die, just as I please, and if you don't answer to suit me, I'll die! I say it, and I mean it—now say yes!"

"Yes."

"Now say, 'Will, I'll marry you!'"

"Will, I'll marry you." And now, she bent down of her own sweet will, and kissed me. Grasping her hands, I held them very tightly and said:

"It was to be he who caught you, Belle! And I've caught you, and shall hold you fast for a whole lifetime."

At this moment a tremendous thrashing in the hedge attracted our attention. Straightway my respected uncle emerged therefrom, with his garments rent into rags, and his scratched face and hands bleeding copiously. His first care was for the horse which I had ridden; and it was not until after he had set him upon his feet and discovered the extent of his injuries, that he condescended to notice me.

"Well, Master Will, a pretty mess, indeed, have you made of it! Is the scamp dead, Belle?" (The reader, of course, will not need to be informed that my compassionate uncle very well knew to the contrary.)

"Not quite, sir," the young lady innocently responded.

"Pity he wasn't—he deserves to be, for laming my best hunter! Here you, Will, wake up and give an account of yourself! What do you mean by lying there with your head in Belle's lap, while poor Harry is skulking on the other side of the hedge, looking as doleful as you please?"

"Ah, it's you, uncle, is it?" I muttered, drowsily, and lazily opening my eyes. "Where have you been the last hour or more? I thought you came to hunt hares! But I'll tell you what, my jolly uncle, as regards my position just now, I've discovered that it is quite possible to hunt young ladies and hares at the same time, and that the former is by all odds the most delightful!"

I have no very distinct recollection of how I returned from the hunt, further than a remembrance of a consciousness of the most excruciating pain, which could not have been endured at all, had it not been for the presence of Belle. The sight of her bright face cheered me beyond measure, and I became hopeful, notwithstanding the knowledge that dreary months of sickness and confinement were in store for me. Nor do I think that my return was quite as rapid as my going forth.

Broken arms, fractured ribs and contused heads are things which time only can heal; and I believe it was time only that healed mine, spite of the seas of liniment and mountains of salve which were expended upon me. I grew better slowly, and after a fashion, but still I improved, so that the long-talked-of wedding was arranged for the Christmas following the accident.

And here a word more of Harry. Poor fellow! he congratulated me upon my future happiness as I lay upon my sick bed, telling me with tears in his eyes, how glad he should have been to suffer twice as much as I was suffering, great as it was, to gain what I had gained, I tried to console him, by telling him there were women as good and beautiful as Belle Catherwood. (I certainly believed nothing of the kind.) But he shook his head, saying that they were not in England, and he didn't believe they were in the world. Belle, however, took him kindly by the hand, assuring him that he should always remain her friend, although he could not be her husband. And Harry—great, foolish, excellent fellow—bubbled over like a child, swearing eternal friendship to both of us.

Upon the Christmas day, therefore, following this memorable hunt, Belle Catherwood and I were joined in matrimony. By a pleasant arrangement of my uncle, the wedding party was composed of only those who had participated in the hunt—and a right royal wedding it was. And in the evening, when presiding over the festive table, my uncle gave the following sentiment, amid the applause of the company:

"Here's to the health of the bride and bridegroom! They were first at the death of the hare—and to-day, for a second time, they have both been IN AT THE DEATH!"

SLEEP.

I wish mine eyes

Would, with themselves, shut up my thoughts; I find
They are inclined to do so.

Do not omit the heavy offer of it;

It seldom visits sorrow; when it doth,

It is a comforter.

SHAKESPEARE.

* The reader will perhaps remember, without assistance, the Autocrat's delicate sentiment upon this subject: "The report of a kiss," he says, "is not half as loud as that of a cannon, but its echo lasts a great while longer!"

THE MISER.

BY ARTHUR L. MESSER.

They tell me that I am growing old,
But my heart still calls for gold, gold, gold!

Though in my stout old oaken chest
A prince's ransom is at rest.

They say that I care not for youth,
Or those that strive for heartfelt truth.

Methinks of a time in early years,
When I was a youth with hopes and fears.

Poverty drear was then my lot—
My home was shunned as a plague-spot.

None stretched a helping hand to me,
I was shunned as they would leprosy.

With every alight the hot blood burned—
'Twas a weary lesson that I learned.

Time passed—and a man gray and old
Is cursed for hoarding his shining gold.

He must help the needy and distressed,
Give to the church, if he would be blessed.

So says the world—I give it all its due;
As ye did to me do I unto you.

Rail on!—my heart is callous and cold,
And still cries out for gold, gold, gold!

AN ENGLISH SMUGGLER.

BY CAPTAIN DUNCAN MOLANE.

BOB CARTER was known at Margate and Deal, on the east coast of England, as one of the most skilful and daring boatmen in the vicinity. Many a vessel he had guided clear of the perils of the Goodwin Sands, and many shipwrecked crews he had rescued from impending death. In the wildest storms, when other boatmen deemed it madness to put to sea, he would make the attempt, even if he failed, for he contended that no man could tell what he could do until he tried. At the time of our story he was between fifty and sixty years of age, a little above the middle height, and strongly built. His boat, a lugger, was manned generally by twelve men, four of whom were his own sons. Having been very successful in wrecking, he was esteemed rich by the boatmen, and could easily have lived the rest of his days without labor; but boating seemed a necessity of his nature. He was never so happy as when afloat.

Like most of the boatmen, he was suspected of smuggling, and whenever he put to sea in moderate weather, one of the revenue cutters was in the habit of keeping the run of him. Lieutenant Bragg, who commanded the cutter Dart, seemed more officious in this business than any of the others; he fancied that he had once seen him sink some tube of brandy when hard pressed by the cutter, but though the place was swept by creepers nothing was found.

A Dutch galliot, by the unskilfulness of her pilot, was anchored off Margate Sands, during a westerly gale; one of her cables parted, and apprehensive that the other might also give way, she signalled for aid. Carter put off with an anchor and chain; but when he reached her, took advantage of the tide, got her underway, and piloted her clear of the South Foreland. She was bound from Rotterdam for Surinam with a cargo of gin, and the wind being fair, proceeded down the channel. As part payment, Carter received a couple of casks of gin. In working to the eastward, after leaving the galliot, he saw a vessel's light, near the southeast edge of the Goodwin Sands. He knew that she was in a dangerous position, and had reason to believe that, with the turn of the tide, she would be liable to drift on the sands. With close-reefed sails and oars, all hands labored nearly four hours before the boat was brought under the lee of the vessel. It was the cutter Dart; her topmast was down, bowsprit rigged in, and she was riding by a single anchor, liable to be driven ashore by every squall. The anchor and chain which had been intended for the galliot, was now of vital importance to the cutter. Lieutenant Bragg regarded the timely arrival as a special interposition of Providence in his behalf. Carter passed the chain on board, and dropped the anchor in the best position he could, under the circumstances, to ease the other. When he went on board, Bragg embraced him, declaring he had saved his vessel. Carter, however, did not respond to the enthusiastic thanks; but suggested that the end of the chain which had parted might be fished up at low water, and give further security to the vessel. She would then have three anchors ahead. This arduous job he accomplished in a gale of wind; the end was brought up and shackled to the part on board, and now the cutter was comparatively safe.

At daylight, the boat hauled up under the stern of the cutter, and Carter sprang on board of her to arrange with Bragg the claim he should make for his services. They disagreed, each was positive, and parted in rather an angry mood.

"What casks are those in your boat?" demanded Bragg, who happened to see them as Carter was about to return.

"Gin, to be sure," responded Carter, gruffly.

"How came you by them?"

"It is none of your business!"

"I'll let you see whether it is or not. Ho, there, jump on board the lugger, half-a-dozen of you, and take possession of her. Mr. Smith, head the party."

Mr. Smith was a master's mate in the service, a man about thirty, who had been thrust aside in the line of promotion, to make room for those who had influence ashore. He was a good sailor, well qualified to command a frigate; but was not very zealous in his present position. On board he went, however, followed by the men; Carter also stepped on board, ordered his men to out oars, and he soon cleared the cutter.

"Well, Carter," said Mr. Smith, composedly, "what do you intend to do with the lugger; for I suppose you still consider her yours, seeing you are two to one against us?"

"Mr. Smith, you have charge of the boat; I yield everything to you," replied Carter. "I have only cleared the cutter because it was necessary for the safety of our lives. When the tide turns, it will create such a swell upon the sand, that our boat would be swamped."

"But Bragg is signaling us to put back?"

"We are too far to leeward; besides your men don't know how to manage a boat of this kind. I suggest, therefore, we put into Dover."

"So do I," replied Smith; "keep her as she goes."

Carter was the first man ashore; he proceeded to the custom house, entered his gin, and explained the circumstances of having it in his possession, while Mr. Smith went to report to the coast-guard station. Notwithstanding the action of the custom house, the coast-guard retained possession of the lugger, until the arrival of the cutter. An investigation of the circumstances by the officers of the customs and of the coast-guard revealed Bragg's conduct in a very unfavorable light, and the only plea which could be urged in his behalf, by way of apology, was "zeal for the service." Still he was made to feel that he would have ruined the men, who had risked their lives to save his vessel, if they had been guilty of smuggling. Carter's conduct in relieving the Dutch galliot, and then proceeding to the cutter, was brought prominently before the public, presenting a strong contrast to the proceedings of Bragg; but the authorities sustained Bragg—they saw in him a man, who would not shrink from the discharge of any duty, and while they rewarded Carter liberally for the aid he had rendered the cutter, expressed their approbation of the conduct of her commander.

Bragg, however, was not satisfied. He felt that Carter had triumphed over him, that he had carried his point, and longed for an opportunity to square accounts with him in the discharge of his duty. There was no doubt in his mind that Carter was a smuggler. Indeed, such an assumption at that time might have been made in relation to nearly all the boatmen.

One stormy night, he selected a large boat belonging to the coast guard, and with a picked crew put to sea. He had received some information, which he hoped to turn to account in person. Mr. Smith was left in charge of the cutter, which lay at anchor off Hastings, many miles from the place where Bragg anticipated to fall in with a prize. If he watched the smugglers, they and their friends also watched him and the cutter. As the wind was then blowing fresh, it was impossible for the cutter to put to sea, and this he was aware, would be the time chosen by the "free traders," to make a run in his vicinity.

The wind was from the southward, blowing directly on the shore, and the coast guard boat was under close-reefed lugs by the wind headed down channel. About ten o'clock, a lugger carrying a press of sail, was seen steering for her; Mr. Bragg kept off to forelay the stranger, and when near, he hailed through a speaking trumpet, to heave-to or he would fire into her. In an instant down went the stranger's sails, and she was brought to the wind, on the weather beam of the coast guard boat. Mr. Bragg and six of his men, cutlass in hand, sprang on board.

"What boat is this?" he demanded.

"The Rescue. Ah, is that you, Mr. Bragg? Who would have thought of seeing you out here such a night? Of course, you remember your old friend, Carter, eh?"

"What have you on board, sir?" was Bragg's surly response.

"Ballast, a cask of water and about a gallon more or less of old Jamaica. I proffer it to brandy. Will you have a glass?"

He made no reply, but inspected the boat. He found Carter's statement correct, and then asked:

"Where are you bound, sir?"

"That is none of your business, sir. The sea is as free to me as it is to you. Now that you have searched and found nothing, the sooner you go on board of your own boat, the better. If you detain me another minute, I will enter a complaint against you."

Mr. Bragg and his men returned to their boat, and Carter again made sail, stood before the wind, and was soon out of sight. Bragg had half made his mind up to return to port; but concluded to keep dodging about until midnight, though he had little hopes of picking anything up. He had been informed that Carter intended to run a cargo of brandy that night, and land it in a certain creek, and had made his arrangement at sea and shore to intercept him. His hopes of a prize, therefore, after boarding Carter and finding nothing, were very uncertain. He put his boat about, however, and headed her eastward. Near midnight another lugger was seen coming before the wind; Bragg laid his boat to intercept her, and when she was near enough, hailed her to heave-to, but she took no notice; he fired a musket, still no change of course took place; down she came so rapidly, that Bragg, when too late to get out of her way, perceived that she would run him down. He ordered all his men to fire; a volley followed, and next minute his boat was capized.

The lugger immediately lowered her sails, rounded to, and picked the men up. She was a French vessel, and not one on board of her spoke English. Mr. Bragg, who understood French, learned that she was a fisherman which had been driven off her own coast by stress of weather, and was now trying to make an English port. She was filled almost to the thwarts with fish and nets. He was anxious to recover his own boat, which did not sink, because she had airtight compartments, and was ballasted with breakers instead of pig iron. The Frenchman after a good deal of labor righted the boat, baled her out, and gave Mr. Bragg a couple of oars, as all his own, the masts and sails, had been lost when she was capized. The crew returned to their boat, but Mr. Bragg lingered behind a minute, and expressed a wish to see if there was anything besides fish under the nets.

"What," demanded the Frenchman, indignantly, "would you suspect me of being a pirate, after rounding to save your life? You have fired at me, without hailing, and now you doubt my word. I am half inclined to throw you overboard."

He felt ashamed, stammered out a kind of an apology and left; but he was not satisfied.

"I believe," said Bragg, speaking to his coxswain, "that Frenchman is a smuggler, and that he has a cargo of brandy under his nets. But what could we do without arms?"

"I don't think so, sir," replied the coxswain; "if he was a smuggler, he would not have picked us up."

"I wish we had our sails, I would follow him; he seems too well acquainted with this coast to be an honest trader; and as I live, the fellow has hauled his wind and is standing down channel."

That night, in consequence of the presence of the cutter in Hastings, the coast guard in that vicinity had been drawn off to the place where Carter was expected to land; to Hastings, therefore, the Frenchman shaped his course.

The next day Mr. Bragg joined the cutter, and as the gale had subsided, got underway, and stood along the coast, looking into every creek for the French lugger, but he saw nothing of her. He then proceeded to Deal, where he saw Carter, who asked him ironically, if he had made any prizes lately.

"By the way, Mr. Bragg, there is a rumor among the boatmen, that over ten tons of brandy were landed at Hastings, within sight of your cutter, the night you overhauled me at sea. What a pity you had not been there!"

"Who told you so, sir?"

A gang of boatmen surrounded him, and responded—"We did—we did, etc. What can you make of it?" They disliked him, because he was always on the lookout for them. Their rumors were confirmed by a notification from the government, who by some means, had ascertained the fact that a large cargo of brandy and silks had been successfully landed at Hastings.

Years passed away, Mr. Bragg had become a post captain and was ashore on half pay, and Carter had also retired from the sea a wealthy man. They were neighbors and friends, and frequently spoke of the incidents of the past, over a social glass.

One evening when they were both pretty happy and talkative, Carter, as he tossed off his neighbor's health in a bumper, said that there was one story which he had never told him.

"I suppose, captain, you remember that night the Frenchman ran you down?"

"Of course, I do, Carter, I shall never forget it, for I nearly lost my life, and what was then almost as bad, my reputation for shrewdness. The scoundrel landed a cargo under the stern of my cutter, while I, who ought to have been on board, was ten miles at sea, knocking about with a couple of oars."

"Well, captain, I commanded that lugger; it was I who ran you down."

"What do you say, Carter, you ran me down?"

"Yes, captain. I knew you were on the lookout. I sailed along the coast, got wind of your arrangements, and then went out in search of you. After we parted, I worked to windward, where I found the French lugger, all ready; I hopped aboard of her, and seeing you were headed to the westward, intended to pass astern of you out of sight, and then haul in along the land for Hastings. But in the meantime, you had tacked, and to my consternation, I found you right in my course. I hesitated a moment but only a moment, and then decided to run you down. I hoped in your eagerness to heave us to, that you would neglect to look after your own boat, and my hope was realized. You had lost steerage way, and I determined to give you the stern, and leave you to sink or swim; but when I heard the cries of your men for help, my humanity overcame me. I could not leave them to perish, though by saving their lives I ran the risk of losing my liberty. We picked you up like good Christians, taking care, however, at the same time, to cast your masts and sails adrift, and scatter your oars. We left you all right, made for Hastings, where our friends were ready to receive us; the cargo was landed, the boat launched, and by daylight, I jumped on board my own boat again, which was in the offing waiting for me. That night's work completed my fortune; it was the last scrape of the kind I ever engaged in."

"Carter," replied the captain, "I always suspected you of smuggling; but I never thought you had a hand in that scrape. I will forgive you, however, upon one condition; I'm going to run for Parliament next election, give me your vote, and I'll call the account square."

"You shall have it, captain, and those of a dozen others, all good men and true, who have run more cargoes of brandy under your nose than would float a ten gun pelter."

Through Carter's influence, he obtained sufficient votes to balance the election in his favor; he was returned to Parliament, and in the course of time became one of the lords of the admiralty. The boatmen rather liked him because they had always outwitted him. He was too zealous, too impetuous, to cope with men, who by constant exposure to danger, had become perfectly self-possessed, under the most trying circumstances. While on the coast guard, they kept him continually on the move by doubtful information, and when he was looking out in one place, they were at work in another. He never took a prize until he was returned to Parliament. Carter and his friends boasted that they made him a lord, because he did not know enough to outwit a smuggler.

MORNING.

Haggard and chill as a lost ghost, the morn,
With hair unbraided and unsandalled feet,
Her colorless robe like a poor wandering smoke,
Moved feebly up the heavens, and in her arms
A shadowy burden heavily bore; soon fading
In a dark rain, through which the sun arose
Scarce visible, and in his orb confused.—HOAR.

THE JEW'S BET.

A Jew in a tavern, in the town of Endingen, saw a merchant whom he seemed to recognize. "Are you one of the good men with whom I had the pleasure to travel from Basle to Strasburg, on the Rhine?"

The merchant assented, and asked:

"Have you, my fellow-traveller, since we met, picked up much traffic?"

The Jew, like a Yankee, instead of answering, asked:

"Did you make a good speculation at the Fair?—if so, I would like to propose a bet to you; that is, I bet that you cannot repeat three words after me, as I say them."

The merchant, thinking that a few pence, more or less, would make no difference to him, replied: "Say on."

The Jew said, "Cutler."

The merchant repeated "Cutler."

Next bagpipe, and bagpipe was responded to.

The Jew smiled and said "wrong."

The merchant, puzzled, bethought himself where the mistake could be; but the Jew, taking a piece of chalk out of his pocket, made a stroke, and said:

"One sixpence for me."

Again the Jew commenced, and said:

"Olive oil."

The merchant said, "Olive oil."

"Tanner."

"Tanner."

The Jew smiled again, and said "wrong."

And so on the sixth time, when the merchant said:

"Now I will pay you, if you can show me how I was wrong."

The Jew said, "You never said the third word, 'wrong,' and accordingly I won the bet."

The merchant paid, and the Jew had made money as he went along.—Vox Populi.

IMPUDENCE.

Captain D—, a young military officer, celebrated for that rare quality, modesty, was lately walking with a friend in the Home-park, Windsor, when they met two remarkably fine young ladies, dressed very plainly, and, at least to all appearance, unattended. D's Mercutio-minded friend offered the gallant officer a wager, he did not dare to go up to one of the rustic beauties, and enter into conversation with her. Dreading his friend's railery on the score of bashfulness, he screwed his "courage to the sticking-place," accepted the wager, and in a very civil manner addressed himself to the strangers, and begged respectfully to know their opinion of the weather; but when, to his astonishment, he became aware that one was the Princess A—, and the other the Princess H—, who were quietly enjoying a walk in a plain and simple manner, in the utmost confusion he bowed and stammered out an apology and retreated, while their royal highnesses, with great condescension and good-humor, smiled at his mistake, and enjoyed his confusion.—London Sun.

FOILED.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

WE were sitting in the old doorway together, cousin Amy and I. The sun was almost down, and its soft, fluttering rays fell slanting at our feet. On the mountains a golden mist was lying, a bit of purple was gathering in the valleys. The poplars upon either side of us were turning the silver of their leaves towards the sky. On the grass below, their shadows seemed alive with tremulous motion. For nearly an hour we had sat without speaking, the quiet beauty of the scene falling upon our hearts like a silent blessing. Of a sudden Amy leaned towards me, and clasped my arm with her pretty soft hand.

"Don't you hear the sound of horses' hoofs in the distance?" she asked, her blue eyes growing large and luminous.

"Yes, dear," I answered, after listening intently for a moment, "but what if I do?"

"Nothing—nothing," she answered, nestling down at my side, "only somehow it startles me terribly. How very funny it is—see my arm shake."

"You foolish little goosie!" I said, smoothing her pale, golden hair back from her forehead. "I don't see what in the world you are frightened at. Hadn't you better run into the house and get father's old gun? Perhaps you'll have a chance to shoot something."

As I spoke, the heavy tramp of a horse's feet came slowly and steadily up the road. Bending forward, her beautiful lips apart, her eyes distended, and the red of her cheeks trembling and wavering, she watched and listened. Her hold upon my arm increased in tightness, until it was fairly painful to bear.

"What is the matter with you, child?" I exclaimed, trying to unclasp her rigidly set fingers. "Why, you look as though you were going stark mad. What is the trouble?—See! one lone, solitary man is coming up the road on horseback. What of it?"

"Yes, Susan, I can just catch a glimpse of his face through the low trees there. See! he is coming nearer—nearer. Now he is plainly in sight—and now—O dear, dear!—he is almost stopping before our door. I believe I shall faint clear away."

I believed so too, although I did not know what to make of her strange appearance. Her face had grown as white as ashes.

"Don't, don't!" I whispered, hurriedly. "I believe the stranger is noticing you," I said, as he checked his horse to a snail's pace, and moved slowly forward.

She did not answer, but sat up straight beside me, fixing her blue eyes upon the gentleman's dark, handsome face. I could see that he was watching her as intently as she was him. For a second I was startled out of my usual composure, but only for that time.

"Nonsense!" I thought—"Amy makes a pretty picture; her clear, perfect features show well against my homely, ungainly face. He is not the first one who has stumbled upon the same discovery."

As these thoughts passed through my mind, he raised his light-colored hat from his jetty curls and inclined his head gracefully towards us; then giving his horse a swift cut with his whip, dashed out of sight.

"See! he has gone, Amy!" I said, drawing a relieved breath.

She did not speak for a moment. When she did her voice was almost fearful in its earnest solemnity.

"That man is my destiny, Susan!" she said. "I feel it to be so way through my heart."

I looked at her in surprise. Indeed, I began to doubt her perfect sanity. But her face had lost its wild eagerness of a moment before, and was as calm and collected as that of a seeress.

"Fie—for shame on you, Amy Grainsby!" I exclaimed, starting up. "Shame! shame to say such a thing, as it were in the face of Alick Hewston—kind, noble, good Alick—and say it so earnestly, too!"

"I can't help it, Susan, you must not scold me. If you only knew how strongly it came to me, even before my eyes rested upon his face!—I shall worship him madly, I know it! And he!—why, I shall be the idol of his heart."

I was unable to stand it any longer. I began to grow thoroughly angry. If I was too plain, practical and matter-of-fact to understand the impressible, sensitive nature of my beautiful cousin, it was not my fault, I only saw the right and wrong of the matter, or at least what seemed so to me.

"When you can speak like your own sense self, Amy," I said, "I shall be glad to listen to you. But you put me out of all patience now."

She smiled and shook her head. Just then I saw Alick Hewston coming across the fields, swinging his straw hat in his hand. He was whistling one of Amy's favorite airs. I turned around to see what effect it would have upon her. She did not notice it at all, but sat as stolid as a rock.

"Alick is coming," I said to her.

"Is he?" was the indifferent reply, as she arose and went into the house.

This was but the beginning of trouble. I do not think Alick had been in the house five minutes before the strange atmosphere began to oppress him. I saw that his eyes grew cloudy, that a troubled, undefined expression settled about his mouth, and crept across his whole face. Still Amy did not appear differently from what she had during other evenings that he had spent with us. She chatted and laughed pleasantly enough; there was nothing odd in her manner, and yet somehow we were all unhappy. When Alick went home she did not accompany him to the door as usual.

"Alick is going," I whispered to her.

"I see," was the indifferent rejoinder.

Beyond that she did not heed me, and poor Alick went home without his good-night kiss—something which had not occurred before for months.

The next morning when Amy and I took our early walk, we met the strange gentleman of the night before.

"I knew I should see him," said Amy, in a low tone, when he first came in sight. "I knew it all the time."

I need not say that I was exceedingly annoyed. The thought flashed through my mind, at the moment, to turn suddenly about with Amy, and go directly home. But I soon saw that this was not best, so I walked slowly forward with her, watching with dismay her rapidly-changing color, and the strange look in her beautiful eyes.

"He is coming quite up to us," she whispered, holding fast to my hand.

That was true enough. He was coming, I thought, like a serpent, his great black eyes glittering and dilating as they rested on the pure face of Amy. Not once did his glance turn towards me. It was she that he was charming and fascinating. Entirely free from his accursed power, how from my heart I hated his dark, handsome face!

"Your pardon, ladies," he said, coming up to us, and speaking, without raising his eyes from Amy's face. "But I have a message for one of you—for this lady, if my impressions are correct," he added, bowing towards her.

"Yes, sir," she said, softly.

"I am recently from California, where I formed a very pleasant acquaintance with your brother, Mr. Frederick Grainsby. I am correct, he is your brother?" he asked of Amy.

"O yes, sir, he is my brother—my dear, good brother!" she exclaimed, looking joyfully up into his face.

"I knew as much when I saw you last evening," he answered, smiling, and displaying a set of white, even teeth.

He was very handsome when he smiled, but for some reason I felt like turning away from him with a shudder.

"Your brother, knowing I was to spend several weeks in these parts, wished me to make your acquaintance," he continued. "I think he told me—indeed, I am quite sure of it—that you were his only sister, and his only near relative."

"Dear brother Fred—how good and kind of him to remember me so! I am very glad he sent you here, sir," she added, with timid grace.

"Thank you—but in the absence of cards I shall be forced to tell you my name," he said, putting his hand in his breast pocket for a card-case. My name is Williard Morton."

"Williard Morton," repeated Amy, prettily. "What a pleasant name! I am Amy Grainsby, of course you know, and this is my cousin—the best cousin in the world—Miss Susan Grainsby," she said, turning to me.

I bowed and smiled. I could not help it, for the ingenuous compliment she paid me.

"You will come and see us often, will you not, Mr. Morton?" she asked, as I took a step or two forward.

"Very often, if you please," he answered, giving a peculiar emphasis to his speech.

I could have struck him for it, for I saw just what an effect it had upon little Amy. I knew I was not courteous in remaining silent, but I could not join her in the invitation. The words would have choked me if I had attempted to speak them. I saw by the single glance that he gave me—for he deigned me but one—that Mr. Morton understood my feelings. From that moment we were enemies. Silent, to be sure, carrying our warfare along by looks, not words or actions, that every one could read and understand; but the feeling of antagonism was not the weaker for this.

That night Mr. Morton called. At seeing him Amy's pleasure was undisguised. The child did not know a single art. Her face, her character was as easily read as a page printed in capitals. He asked her to show him our garden. From the open window I watched them as they went out together, and could only think of a vulture and a dove. While they were out together Alick came. When he asked for Amy, I pointed from the window to the garden. Mr. Morton was eating cherries from her little white hands, which she held together for a fruit-dish.

"Who is it?" Alick asked.

"A friend of Fred's from California," I answered. "He talks of buying the water privilege of our little town for the purpose of building mills. I suppose he is wealthy by that."

He did not answer me, but looked uneasily out of the window. Mr. Morton was still eating cherries from Amy's hands.

"Sit down, Alick," I said.

"No, I can't stay—not to-night," he answered, turning suddenly about. "I have something to see to at home."

He was at the door before the words were half from his lips.

"Take good care of Amy," he said, looking back to me. "Good-night."

I could have cried as he walked down the road. I saw just how his dear, kind heart was troubled, but I could not say a comforting word, because that would be but an admission of what I saw and felt myself.

I do not think Mr. Morton had seen Amy five successive times before he told her that he loved her, although she did not make the fact known to me for nearly two weeks, and he in the meantime had called every day.

"I told you, Susie dear, that he was my destiny," she said, as I stood horror-stricken before her. "I could no more change it, than I could change the color of the sky, or the blossoming of the flowers."

"O, poor Alick!—poor Alick!" I exclaimed. "How could you do so, Amy? It will break his heart, I know it will."

"No, no; it wont, Susan. He wont mind it after a week or two, Mr. Morton says—"

"Don't tell me what Mr. Morton says," I interrupted, indignantly. "He has no right to judge Alick Hewston's heart by his own. Alick is as far above him as heaven is above the lowest depths of perdition!"

Amy's face turned suddenly white. Had she been dead and cold, it could not have been whiter.

"Don't speak so to me," she said, coming up closely to my side. "I love Williard Morton, and there is no changing it. Hearts cannot be bridled and led about at the owner's will. Alick must learn to forget me."

"God grant that he may, and speedily, too!" I answered, bitterly. "I wish he had never known you."

"And so do I," she said, quickly. "I shall tell him so to-night when he comes."

She kept her word. When she saw Alick coming, in the evening, she went out to meet him, and together they walked down the road. I never knew exactly what passed between them, but in a half hour's time she came into the house alone, and said, in a startled way:

"Go down the road a few steps, Susan. Alick wishes to see you."

I went out to him. He was pacing back and forth, with his hands folded before him.

"You know all about it, don't you, Susan?" he asked, in such a pitiful tone, that the tears began to fall from my eyes.

"Yes, dear Alick," I answered, going up to him, and resting my hand upon his arm.

"I don't know what to do," he went on, in the same touching way, as if it cost him a great effort to speak. "What shall I do, Susan?"

"I can't tell you, I'm sure," I said, weeping silently.

"It seems as though I could never take another step forward in life. She has broken my heart for everything in the world," he said, dropping his face for a single moment upon his hands.

"Poor Alick!" I murmured, softly.

"Poor—poor indeed! Why, it was only a few days ago that I thought I was the richest and happiest man in the world! I never loved anybody half so well as I have Amy, Susan. Perhaps I ought to be ashamed to say it, but I loved her better than I ever did my mother."

"Poor Alick!" I said again.

"O yes, yes! And we were so near our marriage, too! Our little cottage is all ready for us. It seems just as though she had wrenched my heart away from me."

"I know it is cruel as death," I said.

"O, death is nothing to it," he answered. "I could have died a thousand times, and it would have been easier than the suffering that is upon me now."

"You must be brave, Alick," I said. "I know it is deathly hard—I know how well you loved her—but to-night I am afraid she is unworthy of you."

"No, no, not that—I do not think that for a moment. But that dark-faced man has won her, I hardly know how. It makes me think of a snake's charming a beautiful bird."

I shuddered. I had thought of the same myself, a hundred times.

"But you will come and see us sometimes, will you not?" I said, as he turned about and walked a step or two forward.

"Sometime—yes—perhaps years from now," he answered. "Good-night."

"Good-night."

And that was all.

They had planned to be married in two weeks' time, Mr. Morton and Amy. All that I could say or do had no power to change the arrangement, and so I set about, with a heavy heart, making ready for the terrible day. Through it all, the house was as still and gloomy as death. Every day, regularly, Mr. Morton came, and as regularly I left the little sitting-room when he entered it.

Time slipped along, and it was the night before Amy's wedding. In the meantime she had heard nothing from cousin Fred, and so with me, she began to look for his coming. This night, the one that preceded the morning on which Amy was to be married, she sat with Mr. Morton in the parlor until a late hour, while I, restless and sad-hearted, wandered about, here, there, and everywhere—first down the road, then into the garden, and then through the house. At last, sitting in the doorway, I fell into a troubled sleep. A few moments passed away, and I was awakened by the clasp of a hand about my wrist. I sprang up. Some one was standing beside me in the clear moonlight. A slight scream arose to my lips.

"Hush, cousin Sue—don't be frightened. Don't you know me—Fred Grainsby?"

"Dear cousin Fred," I cried, joyfully, "how glad I am that you have come! Let me go for Amy—she'll be so glad! O dear, dear, I didn't know you were so near us!"

After Amy came, and Fred had kissed her face over and over again, and held her in his arms, and tossed her about as he used to when she was a mere child, he asked, with quite a roguish look in his brown eyes, "What in the world she was doing in the parlor at so late an hour?"

"O, then, I have something to show you," she answered, blushing redly. "Come in, please."

"But wait a moment. Isn't it Alick Hewston that you are keeping prisoner, say, pet?"

"No, no—come and see. You'll be just as glad as glad can be!"

"Well, then, lead the way."

She skipped before him, and for some reason, I hardly knew then what it was, I followed after them.

"This is my brother Mr. Frederick Grainsby, Mr. Morton," Amy said, as they entered the room, her beautiful face bright and glowing.

"Mr. Morton!" exclaimed Fred, after gasping as though he were losing his breath. "My God! Gilbert Flagg—you've kept your accursed oath faithfully!"

As they stood facing each other, the two strong men, their faces changed to a livid hue. I went around to Amy's side and put my arm about her waist. I was afraid she would fall.

"Your wife and children would like to see you in San Francisco," Fred continued, with a sneer.

"We can dispense with your presence as well as not, I think."

I glanced into Morton's face. His lips were working convulsively. It seemed to me that there was murder in his bad, black eyes.

"Foiled!" he hissed, between his teeth. "One day more, and—"

"Silence, you accursed villain!" thundered Fred. "You shall not finish the miserable, polluted sentence! You swore to touch my heart, but not with steel or bullets. Thank God, she is saved from you!"

"O, and I was going to be his wife to-morrow," cried out Amy, springing to Fred's arms. "Send him away, wont you?"

Without speaking, the villain skulked, like a guilty dog from the room.

"What is it, cousin Fred?" I asked. "What do you mean?"

"Nothing—nothing—only I saved a poor girl from his devilish clutches two years ago. We had been friends until then, when I first learned his true character. He swore a fearful oath that he would touch my heart, and this was his game. But where is Alick, Amy?"

"Don't ask me, Fred, please, and don't hate me either. I am a weak, miserable little girl."

"Never mind then," said Fred, kindly, "we'll let this matter drop, if you wish it. You may run along with Susie and get my supper. I am desperately hungry."

It was months before Amy recovered fully from this sad experience. She went about the house, pale and spiritless. For a long time she did not speak Alick Hewston's name. But one evening when he came home with Fred, she went to him and said:

"Will you forgive me, Alick—just forgive, not love me?"

His heart was not one of stone, and so it was touched; but he did not speak to her of love, and it was well that he did not. She could not have listened to him.

A year passed away, and they were lovers again. O, how happy we were, and how like the old times it grew to be again. While I write, I can see through the heavy trees that shade my window, two brown gothic cottages side by side. Alick and Amy live in one, and Frederick and his beautiful wife in the other, and I—but never mind, I have only told the story. Here it ends.

MEMORY.

There lies a den,
Beyond the seeming confines of the space
Made for the soul to wander in, and trace
Its own existence of remotest glooms;
Dark regions are around it, where the tombs
Of buried griefs the spirit sees.—KEATS.

THE SPANIARD'S REVENGE.

BY HESTER C. LAUREATE.

It was night in Madrid. Within the walls of the city the spirit of quiet held unbroken sway. From the gloomy walls of the Carcel de Carte to the more gloomy ones of the Carcel de Villa, all was silent. Upon the broad, airy streets of the city silvery moonbeams rested, casting ghostly hues upon the grim statues of the Gothic kings, standing as sentinels in the Plaza de Oriente. It was my last night in Madrid; looking from the casement, Marcia Raymonde said:

"How quiet the city is to-night. Beautiful Madrid! do you not feel a strange attachment for this grand old city, Louella?"

"I think Madrid very beautiful, Marcia; and when far away in my English home, I shall doubtless long for one of our promenades on the Prado, but I am a true Englishwoman at heart, and to me there is no place quite so dear as our own 'Merrie England.' But, sometime in the future, I hope to visit Madrid again."

"Sometime, Louella! ah, sometime seems to me almost an eternity. It seems to me to-night, as we sit here alone, with nothing to break this oppressive stillness but our own voices, that I can hardly wait till the time when I shall enter upon life in earnest. To you, the time has already come. To-morrow, and you are a school-girl no longer, you enter upon your woman's life; yet you sit by my side as calmly as though you were not the happiest girl in Madrid this night. When you do come to Madrid again, I shall entertain you in princely style at the ducal palace."

"Marcia! you wild girl! If ever you see the interior of the ducal palace give me an account of it when you come to England."

"If ever I see the interior of the palace! Then you don't believe that you will visit me there, when I am Duchess of Alva?"

"Believe it, Marcia—why should I? I don't know, indeed, what put the wild idea into your silly little head. Do you anticipate a revolution, that Don Ferdinand may be created Duke of Alva?"

"Don Ferdinand! O, Louella, my heart is full of gloomy forebodings. Since Don Ferdinand left the university and departed for his home in Santa Maria de la Almeda, I have heard nothing of him."

"Ah, Marcia, my poor Marcia! Dost remember the warnings I gave when first we met Don Ferdinand on the Prado? Dost remember

I told you of the pride of the Velasquez, that Don Ferdinand Velasquez would never wed a lowly English girl, however beautiful she may be; and you are very beautiful, Marcia."

"Yes, Louella; my beauty is my only dower—if it be not sufficient for the man to whom I have given my heart, there are those of nobler birth in Madrid than Don Ferdinand Velasquez. If his pride prove stronger than his love, my beauty shall one day trample his love into very dust. When I am Duchess of Alva, perhaps." And her proud lip curled, as she laughed a bitter, scornful laugh, very unlike her merry laughter of earlier, happier days.

"When you are Duchess of Alva! You really talk as if the thing were possible."

For a few moments Marcia was silent, looking dreamily upon the still waters of the Manzanares, and the silvery moonbeams falling upon the noble bridges which cross it, then she said:

"Louella, the gitanos are just without the city walls, not far from the gate Puerto de Alcala."

"And you have crossed the palm of some wild Rommany woman with silver, that she might conjure up something still more improbable than your wildest fancy could for a moment imagine. It was enough that you thought to wed Don Ferdinand, but your wildest ambition would not have awakened the thought of your one day being Duchess of Alva?"

"Forgive me, Marcia, but to-morrow we part. How often have I told you of the unhappiness that must follow dreams visionary as yours. Remember, your station in life is lowly."

"Yes, Louella. And if Don Ferdinand were but the humblest peasant, dressing his vines upon yonder green hillsides, and I his bride, my cottage-home would be my palace, and Love the priestess before whose altar Ambition's unquiet steps would all be stayed. But he is not; I cannot make him so. It is for him to say if love, or ambition, be the ruling power of my future. If he gives me love, then love. If scorn, then my ambition shall know no bounds. The fire once kindled, Death alone shall quench. Ambition once the mistress, and my station in life shall be above Don Ferdinand's, not below."

As I looked upon her strange, wild beauty, it was easy to imagine a coronet encircling that haughty brow, the jewels shining like the stars above us among the glassy waves of her purple black hair; costly robes of purple and velvet, where now was only the simple uniform of a school-girl; while methought the bare white walls around us were hang with tapestry, and our narrow beds replaced by couches with pillows of down, encurtained with softest crimson. So much power had Marcia's beauty over my usually calm nature; but the dream was only for a moment, and recalled to myself once more, I said, by way of remonstrance:

"O, Marcia, Marcia!"

But though I said to this, as to all her wild romantic visions, "O, Marcia, Marcia!" deep within my heart was a strong, fervent love for the beautiful visionary, and I knew that on the morrow tears would start unbidden when the hour should come to part me from her. Two years we had been school-mates and room-mates, and on the morrow my father was to journey with me toward my English home. Marcia was to remain in Madrid at the Conservatoire de Musica; her voice was rich and powerful; sometime I expected to hear of her debut as a public singer.

She was an orphan, and alone. How I trembled for her when first she met Don Ferdinand Velezquez. Too well I knew the pride of the high-born Spaniard, to dream for a moment as Marcia did, that he would one day make her his bride. Instead of the brilliant future she could see in the distance, I knew that her high-born lover would cast her from his heart as one beneath him; and I also knew that as yet they were both unconscious of all this. I, the friend and confidant, was the only one of the trio capable of reasoning. Ferdinand and Marcia were blind, wilfully blind. Sometime—I knew that Ferdinand would wake from his dream, then—where would my poor Marcia find herself? Question oft asked; never answered.

But she was proud, ay, proud as the proudest Spaniard of them all. Her pride might be her safeguard. It was the only beacon light I could see for my poor Marcia in the dim, uncertain future. On the morrow we parted. I left the beautiful city of Madrid, scarce knowing if ever I should enter its gates again.

* * * *

Years came and went. In my English home new scenes and interests had in part banished the remembrance of my Madrid life. In part, but not entirely. When all things else seemed like the visions we see in the beautiful dreamland, Marcia, the strange, wild companion of my earlier years, haunted my memory, and ever as I thought of her, there came over me an intense longing to see if the promise of her girlhood was fulfilled in the beauty of her womanhood.

Sometimes I thought Don Ferdinand's love had rescued her from this life, that perhaps her youthful dreams had become actualities. Five summers had the hedges of England grown green, and five winters had the snow rested upon the moorlands, when my father was again called to Madrid. Joyfully I made arrangements to accompany him, and my thoughts were full of Marcia. Poor girl, I said, I will find her, and if her proud spirit is crushed by disappointment and sorrow, she shall return with me to England; and my home shall be her home.

We entered the city by the gate Puerto de Alcala, and as we neared it the long-forgotten prediction of the gitano recurred to me:

"Duchess of Alva thou shalt be,
Seek to know no more from me."

Did Marcia really place faith in the wild words of the Rommany woman, or did she play on the words to hide her grief from me that Don Ferdinand returned not from his father's house in Santa Marie de la Almeda? I knew not. Strange girl! her character was incomprehensible to me. The evening after our arrival in Madrid, my father proposed our going to hear a prima donna who was then upon the high tide of popular favor. We had not been seated long ere the words "the Duchess of Alva" recalled poor Marcia to my mind. With queenly step the duchess passed by, so near that the satin of her robe brushed against my own; over the amber-colored satin was thrown with careless grace a Spanish mantilla, and through the costly lace of her veil diamonds flashed with every motion. Again I said "poor Marcia!"—to imagine for a moment that she should be Duchess of Alva. The duchess was attended by many of the Spanish nobility, and for a moment the beatings of my heart were stilled, as I recognised nearest the duchess the familiar features of Don Ferdinand Velezquez. For the time I forgot to look at the duchess, as I eagerly scanned the features of the dark-eyed daughters of Spain, as one after another lifted her heavy veil.

Vain hope! that Don Ferdinand had made my Marcia his bride. She was not among the attendants of the Duchess of Alva. With a sigh I again looked towards her. She had removed her veil, and there, literally flashing with jewels, serene and self-possessed, sat Marcia—Duchess of Alva. Yes, Marcia! and I, who had laughed the visions of her girlhood to scorn, was but a looker-on, where she had taken her rank among the high-born of the land. On the morrow I sought Marcia—Marcia still to me, Duchess of Alva to the world. Relating her history, she said:

"Dost remember, Louella, I told you beauty was my only dower? It was my beauty that made me Duchess of Alva."

"And Ferdinand?"

"O, Ferdinand was proud. He could not stoop from his exalted station to wed Marcia of plebeian birth; and he dared to tell me this, Louella. I never met him afterwards till a coronet had cooled the fever of my brow. Since the duke died—"

"Marcia! the Duke of Alva dead!"

"Yes, he died soon after our marriage. Since his death I know that Don Ferdinand loves me as of old, ay, better than of old; and, as I said when you and I parted, my beauty, or I may say my pride now, shall trample his love into very dust."

Again I said: "O, Marcia, Marcia!" But she lifted her stately head, saying:

"I would not wed Don Ferdinand Velezquez, not if I knew he would crown me queen of Spain. I scorn a love like his. I hate him now with a hatred as intense as the love I once bore him. Long ago he crushed every feeling of humanity from my heart, and it will be the happiest day of my life when I refuse the offered hand of Ferdinand Valesquez."

As she spoke the drapery beside her gently moved, and pale and stern, Don Ferdinand stood before her.

"Is this a jest, Marcia?"

"No jest, but solemn truth."

"Then while you live you will never be my bride?"

"Never, Don Ferdinand."

"If not mine, then DEATH'S. If not mine in life, then in death!" he exclaimed, in hollow, sepulchral tones, and with gleaming eyes.

Before I could realize the fearful import of his words, the gleaming of steel was followed by the fall of the duchess; then the knife was plunged deep within the heart of Don Ferdinand, and his life's blood mingled with Marcia's, in a crimson stream upon the colmenar stone of the ducal palace. Thus died Marcia, Duchess of Alva. Her weary life's dream over, the beatings of her proud heart stilled, her queenly head laid low. The visions of her girlhood had been realized, the jewels of a duchess had rested upon her brow, and her last resting-place is among the noble dead of the house of Alva.

NOT FRENCH.

A Scotchman, some time ago, took a trip over to France, and astonished the natives there in no small degree. In the hotel where he put up at Bologne, the servants were all newly-imported cockneys, and "Saunders" mystified them not a little by his broad Scotch. Getting up one morning rather earlier than usual, he called a waiting-maid, and accosted her with—"Fetch me ma shunc, lassie." "If you please, sir," said she, "I don't understand French.—English paper."

A WOUND.

If a limb or other part of the body is severely cut, and the blood comes out by spurts or jets, per saltem, as the doctors say, be in a hurry, or the man will be dead in five minutes; there is no time to talk or send for a physician, say nothing, out with a handkerchief, throw it around the limb, tie two ends together, put a stick through them, twist it around tighter, till the blood ceases to flow. But stop, it does no good. Why? Because, only a severed artery throws blood out in jets, and the arteries get their blood from the heart; hence to stop the flow, the remedy must be applied between the heart and the wounded spot—in other words, above the wound. If a vein had been severed, the blood would have flowed in a regular stream, and slowly, and, on the other hand, the tie would be applied below the wound, or on the other side of the wound from the heart, because the blood in the veins flows towards the heart, and there is no need of such a hurry.—London Lancet.

SINGULAR COAL.

Near Cairo, in the vicinity of the N. W. Virginian Railway, live coal has recently been discovered of a peculiar character. On examination, it is found to be a mass of crystallized mineral oil, or petroleum, without any stratification, or intermixture of other substances. When laid on a hot metal plate, this singular substance melts like wax. It yields 165 gallons of crude oil to the ton. After a single process of distillation, 82 per cent. of impure oil remains, and after a second process, 61 per cent. of a clearer oil, and 30 per cent. of lubricating oil and paraffin result. It is thought if shafts were sunk to a sufficient depth a natural reservoir would be discovered, from which this vein has originated, similar to that in an adjacent county.—Virginia Herald.

COBWEB PILLS.

Dr. Donaldson, recommending the web of the common spider as an unfailing remedy for certain fevers, says it is invaluable at times when quinine and other anti-periodics fail in effect or in quantity, not only from its efficacy, but because it can be obtained anywhere, without trouble and without price. This remedy, it was observed, was used a century back, by the poor in the fens of Lincolnshire, and by Sir James M'Gregor in the West Indies. The doctor now uses cobweb pills in all his worst cases, and is stated to have said that he has never, since he tried them, lost a patient from fever.—London Journal.

Hydrophobia and Smothering.

In the Dublin Chronicle, of the 28th of October, 1881, the following circumstance is recorded:—"Thursday morning an accident happened at the Blackrock (Dublin), which has been attended with most melancholy consequences. A fine boy, about fourteen years old, passing by a gentleman's house, the lady's lapdog ran out and bit him. In about two hours the youth was seized with convulsive fits, and shortly after with the hydrophobia; and notwithstanding every assistance that night his friends were obliged to smother him between two beds."

SMILES.

BY HENRY TAYLOR.

There is a smile which wit extorts
From grave and learned men,
In whose austere and sallow sports
The plaything is a pen;
And there are smiles by shallow worldlings worn,
To grace a lie, or laugh a truth to scorn.

And there are smiles with less alloy
Of those who, for the sake
Of some they love, would kindle joy
Which they cannot partake;
But her's was of the kind which simply say
They come from hearts ungovernably gay.

And O, that gaiety of heart!
There lives not he to whom
Its laugh more pleasure will impart
Than to the man of gloom;
Who, if he laughs, laughs less from mirth of mind,
Than deference to the customs of mankind.

PAUL AND I.

A Leaf from the unwritten History of two Lives.

BY WILLIAM B. ARNOLD.

I HAVE heard it said that our thoughts are always tinctured by the moods in which they find us, and I believe it. And if this story of mine shall be thought rather sober than otherwise, the reader will know to what cause to ascribe its relation. It may be unfortunate, that this, the only tale which I can tell, should be one of the heart—of that class called love stories, which are sneered at and multiplied daily. But I make no apology for its appearance, and I shall be satisfied if it shall carry conviction to the hearts of my readers, of the truthfulness of which its simplicity admits.

Paul Edwards and I were playmates and schoolmates, and grew to be men, as we had been boys together. And firmly, indeed did our friendship strengthen, as we grew older. Never were brothers more strongly knit together in spirit; and never from the first moment of childish acquaintance, was this intimacy once interrupted by the slightest misunderstanding. True, we were often pitted against each other in those strifes for academic prizes and honors, in which all students so eagerly engage; and, I am free to say it, such was our rank and estimation among our schoolmates, that whenever we entered the field, the reward was from the first virtually conceded to one of us; and between ourselves there was the most perfect understanding upon every such occasion. If Paul won, I was proud to be the first to take him by the hand and congratulate him upon his success. If I, on the contrary, was the fortunate one, no jealousy, no feeling of envy, ever compelled his noble nature to withhold from me a like tribute. Nor did it matter that he was far the most frequently the victor in these hotly contested conflicts of mind. Perhaps I secretly envied him the possession of that brilliant intellect which carried him to the goal of his wishes, seemingly without an effort, while I was forced to earn my hardly-won honors by close and wearisome application; but the feeling extended no further. The friendship, the love of a heart like that of Paul Edwards, were too precious to be lightly sacrificed.

School days were at length over, and before entering upon the study of the professions we had respectively chosen, we mutually resolved to take an interval of recreation. I am speaking now of a time and locality, in which the possession of an educated and cultivated mind was a sure passport to the best society. And when we had gained admittance into the charmed circle of social life, we were like beings upon the threshold of a new world. We had entered into another school, where the study was one of humanity, and not from books, and we seized upon the delights presented to us, with an avidity for which our recluse-life had prepared us.

It was at a large and fashionable ball, during this time, at which we assisted, that we both first saw Kate Irving. She was the acknowledged belle and beauty of the city, and she never appeared at a public gathering like this, without a numerous train of admirers. To these, Paul and I were instantly added, from the first moment of our presentation. The same fascination which had entrapped a hundred others, was now exerted upon us, and to it we yielded passively and willingly. Eager to create a favorable impression, we contrived to monopolize her to ourselves during the whole evening, to the exclusion of all others; and our attentions were so smilingly and so graciously received, that the feverish bewilderment which is the forerunner of love, enthralled us both. Alternately we danced, conversed and promenaded with her, and at the conclusion of the ball, both of us assisted her to her carriage, and received her farewell smile of gracious approval.

The carriage rolled away, and passing his arm within mine, Paul walked with me slowly from the spot. The night air was cool and pleasant, but the fever in my blood burned none the less hotly—the excitement of the last three hours still clung to me. For some distance we walked thus, silently and without speaking, and then I looked at my companion. His large gray eyes were thoughtfully turned towards the pavement, and a painful look of intense care overspread his handsome face. Never had I seen him so serious; and as he became conscious that I was looking fixedly at him, he looked up and suddenly paused. I paused with him, and almost involuntarily each pronounced the other's name.

"Paul!"

"Louis!"

There was nothing but unshaken friendship in our tones, as well as our glances, and simultaneously we clasped hands with a cordial pressure.

"Let us understand each other, Louis," were his first words. "There must be no coldness between us because of what has happened to-night, or what is likely to flow from it."

"No, Paul, no! God forbid that our friendship should thus cease! There should not be women enough in the world to cast a blight over it!"

Smiling at my outspoken earnestness, he replied:

"I trust it is so. And now let us speak freely and candidly. One of us can win Kate Irving; both cannot."

"But are you sure," I asked, "that one of us two is to be thus happy?"

"I am positive of it. In all our steps hitherto, none have dared to compete with us, and for the reason that we brought to the struggle, in every instance, a vigor and determination to succeed, which distanced all rivalry at the outset. Into this new contest for that which must make the happiness of one of us—"

"And mar that of the other," I interrupted.

"Nay, Louis, not so. It will be to the unsuccessful wooer a dream, whose effects will be but temporary. In short, however, I have convinced myself that either you or I can and will wed Kate Irving. But which?"

"Ay, which? Tell me that, Paul."

"I know not, and for the present care not. Let us enter the field fairly and honorably—let each strain every nerve if he will, and gain the goal if he can; and, above all, let him who shall be disappointed submit uncomplainingly, and joyfully acquiesce in the happiness of his friend. Is it a compact?"

"With all my heart." And we clasped our hands upon it with an earnestness which bespoke the unflinching assent of both.

"Happiness to the happy man!" Paul enthusiastically cried. "If we were at my rooms, we would pledge him in a glass of champagne. But remember this also, Louis—we must at first keep a watchful eye upon those who are vain enough to enter the lists with us. Here is our motto. 'All join to guard, what each desires to gain.' And don't forget, my boy, to notice my movements with some little suspicion!"

With a merry laugh, and a cordial "good-night," we parted. When we next met, it was at the home of Kate Irving, as rivals, though still friends. It would be useless for me to note all the details of the efforts put forth upon either side to gain the common object. Never, I verily believe, were such strategy and generalship put forth in a love tournament—never were mines and counter-mines more skillfully constructed, or advances more energetically pressed. Our visits to the house were made with almost exact regularity, and so warm was our rivalry, that I believe neither of us was able to see Miss Irving for several weeks without the presence of the other. I was unable to perceive that either was favored above his rival, although both received such encouragement as quickly convinced me of the truth of Paul's prophecy, that one of us was to be preferred above all others.

Without any foundation, in fact, for the belief, I nevertheless reasoned myself into the conviction that in this strife I was to be the victor. Paul had hitherto borne away honors for which I had zealously contended, and now, I fancied that the turning-point of his good fortune was passed, and that my star was in the ascendant. The conviction arose, perhaps, from a belief in the justice of such an event, since the most careful observer could not have detected the slightest preference in the intercourse of Kate Irving with us. But from whatever cause the feeling arose, it had attained such a firmness, that I more than once pitied poor Paul in his prospective disappointment, and hoped that he would bear his defeat with the same magnanimity as I should under like circumstances!

One evening when I called at the home of Kate Irving, I was fortunate enough to find her alone. Obeying the impulse suggested by the circumstance, as well as by the encouragement which her smiling welcome afforded, I ventured to express my love and ask for its reward. She listened with downcast eyes, and with evident confusion, and faltered in reply, that she respected and admired me—that she almost loved me; and were it not for one other, to whom her heart was pledged, though he was unconscious of it, she could gladly bestow her hand and affections on me. I heard her with ashen cheeks and sinking heart—and when she had finished, I asked, as I had no need to do, the name of that other. And she told me—Paul Edwards!

When I left the side of her who had by these few simple words unconsciously wrecked and blasted my life and hopes, my plans were fully matured. Hastily seeking Paul, I told him in a quivering voice which betrayed my emotion, what had happened, and informed him of what he had not yet ventured to learn—that Kate Irving loved him better than myself, better than all others! Then, in a feeble whisper, I congratulated him upon the happiness within his grasp, and asking him to forgive the foolishness of a broken heart which would not permit me to stay and witness the consummation of that happiness, I wrung his hand and left him. And a week after, standing upon the deck of an outward-bound merchantman, I waved an unregretful farewell to the land of my birth, and my sorrows.

I had seen Paul Edwards for the last time; and I heard from him only once, in a letter which he wrote me, filled with the particulars of his wedding, and with anxious inquiries as to my future plans and movements. It remained unanswered; I had not the heart to frame a reply. But though I was fated never again to take him by the hand, he yet influenced my after life in a manner so strange that I can hardly now think it real. The conclusion of my brief narrative will explain my meaning.

I remained abroad for six years—time enough, I thought, to enable me to obtain control over my rebellious passion for Kate Irving, and to subdue myself to meet her and her husband without emotion. The task was a hard one. Often, when thinking of her who was given to bless and render happy the life of another than me, the tear would start unbidden, and the lip involuntarily tremble. But at last I believed myself conquered by my own will, and I embarked for America, a sad, although not altogether a hopeless man. Upon my arrival, I made no special exertions to find Paul and his wife. Early inquiry made me aware that they had, a year after their marriage, removed from the city where I had left them, to the South, and totally indifferent whether I ever saw them again—such was my reckless, almost wicked state of mind—I resumed my residence, which had been left upon my transatlantic journey, and endeavored to let the remembrance of what I have narrated lapse into oblivion. Accident alone subsequently revived it in a most remarkable manner.

A year after my return, I had occasion to visit a Southern city. During the course of an evening, I happened into the parlor of my hotel. There were several persons of both sexes present, but my attention was immediately drawn to a lady, dressed in half-mourning, who occupied a seat a little distance from me. Her profile, as I first saw it, seemed wonderfully familiar, but when she turned her full face towards me, I at once recognized Kate Edwards. She saw me at the same instant, and with an exclamation of pleasure, she came towards me and offered her hand. For a moment, as I returned her pleasant salutation, I retained her hand and looked upon her face. She was, indeed, the same Kate whom Paul and I had loved—and yet, how changed!

These seven years added to her life, making her now scarce twenty-five, had deepened her girlish beauty, touching it with the thoughtful maturity of the woman, and lending to it an inexpressible charm. Lovely indeed did she appear, as I led her to the sofa, and seated myself by her side, her whole face overrunning with the joy which my presence evidently afforded her. But my thoughts wandered for the moment from her, and I asked the question which half-died upon my lips as I observed the ominous character of her dress:

“Where is Paul?”

“Dead! He died three years ago. He sleeps in the cemetery in this city.”

Her handkerchief was pressed to her eyes, as she spoke, and although the announcement was not unexpected, my own involuntarily filled with tears. Poor Paul! This was the end of his hopes; a few short years with the idol of his soul, and then death—and that perhaps, with the consciousness that he had alienated his best friend. I wondered, too, whether Kate had really been to him all he had hoped and wished for. Yet this I could not reasonably doubt, as I again noted her loveliness, and sighed to think of the time when I loved her equally with him.

After a few moments of sad thoughts, at my request Kate spoke of the death of her husband. In his last hours, she said, my name was often on his lips, and in his dying moments he had confided to her a miniature of himself, with the injunction to convey it to me. She left the room to obtain it, and returning, placed it in my hands. It was a most faithful representation of Paul—but not as I had known him. The face was thin and careworn, and the whole expression of it that of fixed sadness. What could it mean? It had been painted a year before his death, as Kate informed me, and I with difficulty restrained myself from inquiring what had wrought this terrible change—for it seemed terrible to me that Paul Edwards, gay and light-hearted as he was, should be so quickly transformed into a sad, melancholy man. I pondered upon it that evening after I had parted with Kate—first agreeing.

to meet her at the same place the following evening—but I could arrive at no satisfactory solution. The thought that oftenest haunted my mind, was one that I could not, and would not entertain—that Kate Edwards was very different from what she seemed, and that an artful and attractive exterior might conceal unwomanly defects and imperfections, which might have much to do with the decline and death of Paul. But this was an hypothesis which my heart indignantly denied.

The business which had called me from home was soon adjusted, but I still lingered in the Southern city. I sought not to conceal from myself that Kate Edwards was the cause of my delay. My old longings speedily returned. The flame which had smouldered, but never died for seven years, burst forth afresh. It had been easy when a girl of eighteen, for her to fascinate and enthrall me as others—doubly easy now, in the perfected beauty of her womanhood. And I sought not to escape the charm of her society; yielding myself to it, I began to regard the past only as a hateful dream, and to look upon my life as just commenced. To be brief, in three months after my first meeting with Kate in the hotel parlor, we were betrothed. The proposed day of our union rapidly approached, and in anticipation of it I gave myself up to perfect happiness.

There was one little circumstance in relation to the picture which Paul had bequeathed to me, which troubled me more than I was willing to admit. The miniature itself was painted upon a piece of ivory a quarter of an inch in thickness, and upon the back of this, written with some indelible fluid, in a hand which I readily recognized as that of Paul, was the one mysterious word, in Greek characters—"Search!" I called the attention of Kate to it, but she was unable to throw any light upon its meaning. That Paul had written it to call my attention to something, was to me perfectly apparent. But to what? It increased, as I pondered upon it, into as obscure a mystery as the other, of Paul's incomprehensible transformation. I examined the miniature itself, but it afforded no clue. The brevity of the direction, and its being written in other characters than English, immediately impressed me with the conviction that it had been done in this manner under the fear that the picture might fall into the hands of some person, who might otherwise be enabled to read the word, comprehend it, and profit by it, instead of myself.

Search—and for what? Not for Kate, since the miniature had been delivered into her hands.

I tried to connect the word with the idea that Paul desired the union of Kate with myself, but it would bear no such construction. It was as meaningless as the inscription upon an Egyptian obelisk—and yet I felt that with that riddle read, which was locked up in that one word, it would be found pregnant with weal or woe to me. For hours together I thought upon it, and upon the secret of that melancholy face which the picture represented, and failing to comprehend either, they haunted my dreams. Frequently in my uneasy slumbers, Paul seemed to stand before me, looking as sad as in the picture, and pronouncing the single word, "Search!"

In the uneasiness which constant brooding over these enigmas had produced, I turned my attention to Kate, and endeavored to find in her past conduct a clue to assist me. Nothing, however, was noticeable, save a certain studied affectation of sweetness of demeanor, as I thought, with which she always greeted my appearance, while at the same time it would never have occurred to me to accuse her of artfulness.

Such was the position of affairs, upon the night preceding the day of our wedding. Anxious and abstracted, I had thrown myself upon my bed without removing my clothes, and insensibly my thoughts ran into the usual current. For perhaps five minutes I lay thus, and then unconsciously gave utterance to the word, "Search!" And simultaneously a conviction of the real meaning of the word burst upon my mind. Springing to my feet, I took the miniature from my pocket, and proceeded to examine it by the aid of a lamp. In the centre of the edge of ivory, was an indented line running around it. Inserting the blade of my knife into this, I quickly pried the ivory into halves, from between which a neatly-folded letter dropped out! It was addressed to me in the familiar hand-writing of Paul, and with emotions such as may be imagined, I broke the seal and read it.

The information conveyed by that letter was truly astounding. Writing upon his dying bed, my unhappy friend poured forth the story of his sorrows—how too late he had discovered the wife of his bosom to be a heartless, faithless woman of the world, whose artful smile was seen nowhere but in the presence of those whom she wished to delude, and whose hateful cruelty had driven him mad. He wished for a being to love; she whom he had wedded, neither loved him, nor cared for his love. Pride, fashion and deception were her gods. She seemed to have no heart, no soul, no emotion. Beneath the terrible blow inflicted by this unexpected revelation, he had pined and died, and he concluded by warning me most earnestly not to fall into her toils, to become at last, wretched, miserable and heart-broken.

I read the letter, and reflected upon it. It was like a voice from the tomb. It explained everything concerning which I had been in doubt. My dream had fled, the delusion of my life was past, and its idol turned to clay, but I shed not a tear; on the contrary, as I reflected longer, I exulted over my escape, and the freedom which was now restored to me. Brave, noble Paul Edwards—our friendship had indeed extended beyond the grave! While mourning over the choice of Kate Irving, I had unconsciously escaped a fate which brought him, with his noble, sensitive soul, to the grave—and now it seemed as though his hand had been outstretched from that grave, to perform its last and greatest office of friendship.

The next morning Kate met me, her face wreathed with hypocritic smiles. Handing her Paul's letter, I bade her read it. She did so, and as she proceeded, consternation took possession of her face, which changed rapidly from white to red, and again to the livid hue of fear, until overwhelmed with shame, confusion, and it may be remorse, she sank down fainting at my feet. I needed no further proofs; she was now self-accused and convicted; and I left her forever. It is several years since a Southern paper reached me with the tidings of her death. I read the announcement with a shudder—I knew that she was unfit to live, and feared she was unfit to die.

I can only add that I am an old man now, and that I have never married. Paul has been my idol, and I have not cared to form relations which might withdraw my mind from him. And who shall say that all this has not happened well and wisely? Who shall say that the hope of one day rejoining my noble friend Paul, the friend of my youth, has not been made an instrument for the preservation of one, who might otherwise have been perverted and led astray by the wild recklessness of youth?

END OF GENIUS.

Cuzzoni was one of the most celebrated vocalists of her time. She refused a bonus of $50,000, offered her by an Italian manager, to return to Italy. This lady was born in 1723, and singers were even then paid enormous prices for their services. She was capricious to excess. When a gallant lord carried her a rich lace, worthy of a queen, she having expressed a wish for one, she tore it to shreds, saying it was not the one she asked for. Handel controlled her sometimes; threatening even to throw her out of the window. She married a jeweller, and died in misery, after having recklessly squandered fortunes. At the close of her life, she was reduced to making buttons for subsistence.—Journal of Music.

BY MY COTTAGE DOOR.

BY WILL ALLEN.

By my cottage door now stealing,
Like a roguish, dancing elf,
Sending music onward pealing,
Laughing, singing to itself,
Is a rill that never ceases
Tumbling, bubbling by my door;
And its music oft increases
Sliding 'tween gray rocks and o'er.

Downward from the jagged mountains
Steals this purser of pure rills;
Downward from the bursting fountain,
Running now 'tween woody hills.
Now by songster-haunted bowers,
Now by banks, then by my door;
Springing oft to kiss the flowers
Leaning on the banks and o'er.

Wanton is this rill—and often Steals it up to some gay blossom;
Laugh it hushes, music softens,
Amorous clasps it to its bosom!
Yet withal this rill is clever:
Whirls the mill-wheel by the hill;
Singing always, tumbling ever,
By my door, thou roguish rill!

LIFE INSURANCE.

A MYSTERIOUS CASE OF SUICIDE.

BY WALTER CLARENCE.

"LOUISA," said Mr. Manners to his only daughter, "I have this day effected an insurance of twenty thousand dollars upon my life; so, my love, let what may happen, you will at least, be moderately well provided for when I am dead and gone."

"O, papa," returned Louisa, "don't speak of your death. What would money be to me if you were not living? besides I have always disliked the idea of one person's insuring his or her life for the benefit of another, and then what possible need can there be for you to insure your life, with your large property and ample income, and, as I have often heard you say—no one to leave it to but me?"

"In the first place, my dear," replied Mr. Manners, "money would be your best, perhaps your only earthly friend if I were to die; then your objection to life insurances is mere folly; and lastly, rich as I may now term myself, riches sometimes make to themselves wings and fly away, and I am a merchant, still in business, and therefore I cannot say what adverse circumstances may occur, to render me a poor man yet before I die."

"Well, well, papa," replied Louisa, "you may insure for what you please, but, depend upon it, I will never touch the money. Indeed, I expect to have more than I shall need without it."

Mr. Manners was, as he had said, a merchant, and a man of great wealth, and it did surely seem to be a ridiculous croquet on his part to insure his life for so large a sum, and of course to subject himself to the heavy premium to keep the policy good, more especially as he was not yet past the period of middle life, in perfect health, and had every reasonable prospect of living long enough to pay the entire sum in annual premiums to the insurance office.

But it does seem sometimes, as if there was a providence in these things, or a secret prognostication of coming evil. Five years after the above recorded conversation had taken place between him and his daughter, his circumstances had become sadly reduced, though everybody still believed him to be very wealthy, despite of his well known losses. There had occurred a war on the continent of Europe and he had speculated largely, in full and confident expectation of the continuance of the war, when peace was suddenly and most unexpectedly declared. Then, he had sent vast quantities of goods to India, which reached their destination only to find the market glutted, in consequence of large importations from Europe having arrived there beforehand. Then he purchased a great many shares in, and granted large loans, to, a railroad company which became bankrupt, and altogether had been so very unfortunate that people said:

"Why doesn't Mr. Manners retire from business before he loses everything? when once a man begins to go down hill, he seldom stops till he reaches the bottom."

The truth was that Mr. Manners had got to the bottom, already, and he only remained in business in the futile hope of recovering some of his losses, and of concealing their direful effect from the world.

Meanwhile, during these years, his daughter had passed from girlhood to womanhood, and had been wooed and won by a young man, the son of an eminent banker, and himself holding a lucrative position in his father's bank. The wedding was to come off in three months, when one day Mr. Manners did not come home to dinner at his usual hour. He had said nothing to his daughter or to the servants of any probable detection in town, and Louisa had kept dinner waiting till nine o'clock; then she began to grow uneasy, and messengers were sent everywhere, where it was thought likely that he might be heard of, to make inquiry respecting him. But all in vain. None of his friends or acquaintances had seen him, and the warehouse and offices down town were closed and the messengers did not know where to find the clerks or porters.

Poor Louisa passed a miserable night, a prey to all manner of doubts, fears and anxieties, and as soon as it was time to re-open the warehouse and offices in the morning, messengers were again despatched, to make inquiries, and learn, if possible, what had become of the merchant.

They knew nothing more than that he had left the warehouse at noon on the previous day, without having informed anybody where he was going, and had not since returned.

His daughter's alarm was now tenfold increased; but the day had passed away, and another, and another, and still there were no tidings of him. Louisa was almost wild with grief, and the friends of the missing gentleman were at their wit's ends to think what could have become of him. At length, on the fourth day of his absence, a coat and hat were found by some laborers, on the banks of the Hudson, about six miles from the city, and were speedily identified as having belonged to the missing gentleman, and almost simultaneously with this discovery several notes drawn by Mr. Manners fell due at different banks in the city and were dishonored.

The intelligence came like a shock upon the citizens. No one had dreamed that the merchant's affairs were in such a condition, and least of all, no one would have dreamed that a man like Mr. Manners would under any circumstances have put an end to his own existence. In such a case the insurance office would, of course, have refused to pay the insurance upon his life; but that was the last thing poor Louisa thought of; and while people were still wondering, and lifting up their hands and eyes in horror, a fresh discovery was made of shoes and stockings, and other garments which were saturated with water and had evidently been washed away by the tide and then cast on shore again; and, the same day, two gentlemen arrived in the city, from Albany, who said that they had met Mr. Manners on the day of his disappearance, about a mile from the city; that they had spoken to him, and that he had told them that he was going to bathe in the river. He appeared, they said, to be remarkably cheerful, and as it was known that he was fond of bathing, and often bathed near the spot where the clothing was found, public opinion took another turn, and it was universally believed that he had gone to bathe as usual, and had been attacked with cramp, or met with some accident while in the water, and had been drowned. Still people wondered to find his affairs in such disorder; the news was spread abroad, creditors came pouring in, and it was soon discovered that he was hopelessly insolvent, and had been in that condition for several months! Bankruptcy was declared against the estate; but all his assets were found to be insufficient to pay even a moiety of his debts, and his daughter Louisa was left utterly destitute.

Her father's untimely death, as a matter of course, would have delayed her marriage under any circumstances; but now that it was known that he had died a ruined man, those who were in the secrets of the family said that Ralph Onslow, Louisa's accepted suitor, would assuredly break off from his engagement, and for their part, they added, he would, they considered, be justified in doing so.

Louisa, herself, wrote him a letter, blistered with many tears, and written very incoherently, in which she informed him that she could not hold him bound to fulfil his promise of marriage, though she added, her heart was breaking, and if he forsook her she would not care to live.

But Ralph Onslow was not the heartless being that many imagined him to be, and he forthwith replied that if she released him from his bond, he would not release her, and he claimed its fulfilment, as soon as a reasonable time had elapsed from her father's decease; moreover he said he should call on the morrow, and should feel happy, if in any way he could conduce to her comfort in the great affliction which had befallen her.

It is needless to say that Louisa was much relieved by this kind letter from her lover, and on the following day, true to his promise, he called at the house, and held a long conversation with her, in the course of which he told her she was in duty bound to claim the insurance on her father's life.

Louisa refused at first, then demurred and hesitated, and, at length, won over by Ralph's persuasions, consented, he having promised to see to the matter himself, assuring her that it should cause her no trouble or annoyance.

Ralph found that the insurance company still hesitated, indeed at first positively refused to pay the amount demanded, basing their right to refuse on the fact that there was still much reason to believe that Mr. Manners had committed self-destruction; and the probability that such was the case was shown by the ruinous condition of his affairs at the time of his death, a state of things which he had told to no one.

Against this, Ralph brought the evidence of the two gentlemen from Albany; the fact that the greater portion, if not all the unfortunate man's clothing, had been found, and no one in his senses, he said, would divest himself of all his clothing with the intention of committing suicide; and furthermore, the well known fact, that the unfortunate gentleman had long been accustomed to visit the spot where the clothing was discovered, for the purpose of bathing.

The company still refused, and threatened to go to law; but Ralph was firm and public opinion was on his side, besides which, people began to say unpleasant things about the office refusing to stand to their engagements, so, at length, the twenty thousand dollars were reluctantly paid, and Louisa found herself, if not so rich as she had been accustomed to believe she would be, at her father's decease, at least placed very far above the fear of want.

Poor Louisa! she had often said that she could never bring herself to make use of money paid by a life insurance company; but now she found how stern and relentless a thing is necessity, and she recollected her father's words:

"Louisa, you may discover that money is your only earthly friend."

Alas! In the brief period that had elapsed since her father's death, she had already found his words true, for with the exception of Ralph, all her friends had forsaken her, though now that she had received the insurance money, many of them would gladly have returned to her, had she permitted them. But she sternly refused to see those who had forsaken her when they believed her to be wholly destitute.

Removing from the spacious house which her father had occupied, she took possession of a small and exceedingly pretty cottage, inclosed in a garden, tastefully laid out and of considerable extent, a few miles north of the city. There was a piece of woodland in the rear of the garden, which extended to the shelving banks of a narrow stream which flowed into the Hudson about a mile from the spot.

To this lovely suburban retreat she retired, with an elderly woman who had been her nurse, and subsequently had acted as housekeeper to her father after his wife's death. This worthy woman was strongly attached to her young mistress, and when the sad catastrophe occurred which brought to light the hopeless ruin of Mr. Manners's affairs, she positively refused to quit the service of the young lady, declaring that she did not care for wages, as she had laid by during her long service, an ample sufficiency for her old age, and Louisa, glad to find so true a friend in her distress, albeit so humble a one, did not urge her departure any further. She consented that Mrs. Brady should remain with her, though more as a companion than in the light of a domestic servant. One young maid servant was engaged to perform the menial services of the small household, and thus situated, as happy as it was possible for her to be with the recollection of her recent loss, under such terrible circumstances, she awaited the close of the twelve-months which it had been mutually agreed upon between her and Ralph, should intervene, between the death of her father and the solemnization of their nuptials.

The sum received from the insurance office, carefully invested, furnished her with quite a sufficient income for her simple requirements, though, so strong had been her antipathy to the system of life insurance, so decided her repugnance to avail herself of an income derived, as she insisted, from the death of her beloved father, that she almost shrunk from its expenditure, and had she had any other means of support she would undoubtedly have given the money to some public charity.

She seldom went abroad, still more rarely visited the city. Her walks were chiefly confined to strolls in the large garden, which she kept in excellent order with the labor of her own hands, and very frequently on a fine afternoon or evening, to a ramble into the wood, and on the banks of the stream beyond. The wood which was not too thickly planted, and was unusually free of brushwood and undergrowth, was indeed her favorite resort. She caused several rural benches and chairs to be constructed and placed in her favorite spots, and seated on one of these, with a book, or sometimes some light or fancy needlework or embroidery, to occupy her attention, when thought and self-communion grew painful, she would sit for hours, sometimes alone, sometimes with Mrs. Brady for a companion.

During the early period of her residence in the cottage she had never met with an intruder in the solitude of the wood. Far removed from the din and confusion of the city and even from the occasional bustle of the highway, it appeared to her as sacred from intrusion as the wilderness of the far West; but at the expiration of the first six months, she felt satisfied that she was watched during her rambles. True, she saw no one, but she frequently heard the light tread of footsteps, the rustle of the fallen dry leaves, the occasional rebound of a yielding branch.

At first she thought this might be mere fancy, but its frequent repetition, and its immediate cessation as soon as she stopped and listened, soon satisfied her that her suspicions were not unfounded. The sounds were not caused by birds or squirrels, for these—and the wood abounded with them—unused to molestation, flew from branch to branch, or skipped and frolicked close under her feet, by no means alarmed at her presence within their sylvan domain. Whatsoever or whoever occasioned the sounds, she was satisfied followed and watched her narrowly, and at the same time was anxious to keep out of her sight.

She could not bear the idea of giving up her favorite rambles, and yet she was afraid to go to the wood any more alone. She spoke to Mrs. Brady on the subject, but the old lady tried to persuade her that it was mere nervous fancy. However, from that period, for several weeks, she never entered the wood unaccompanied by the old housekeeper, and as, when thus accompanied, the sounds were unheard, she, at length, began to think that her fears had deceived her and were the mere result of imagination. She often felt a desire to be alone with her own thoughts, and, after a while, she again ventured into the solitude of the wood unaccompanied, and for some time, without a recurrence of the sounds which had caused her alarm.

One day, however, she heard them again. Resolved, if possible, to satisfy herself as to their reality, she mustered up her courage, turned about suddenly, and walked quickly in the direction whence they proceeded.

It was late in the afternoon, and already beginning to grow dark in the shades of the wood; but she felt satisfied that she discerned a human figure beating a hasty retreat. With a degree of courage not natural to her, but inspired by her peculiar situation, she followed rapidly. Still the figure retreated, quickly, but so silently, that the sound made by her own light footsteps completely deadened those of the pursued, though the figure appeared to be that of a tall, stout man. Still she followed, only sometimes losing sight of the figure, then again catching a glimpse of it, until it emerged from the shadows of the woods. When she also came forth into the clearing which led to the banks of the stream, it had vanished; how or where, she could not conceive, for nothing was in the way to intercept the view of the water.

Half inclined to believe that, after all, she had been a dupe of imagination, and now that the chase was over, alarmed at her own temerity, she was on the point of turning, to hasten home, when a light skiff resembling an Indian bark canoe, darted forth from beneath an overhanging rock on the banks of the stream, being paddled rapidly across, by the figure she had obtained glimpses of amongst the trees. Now there was nothing to intercept the view; no sound came from the paddles as they were dipped rapidly in the flashing water, the canoe seemed to glide along as if impelled by supernatural agency, so rapid, yet so inaudible was its progress. The figure seated in the bottom of the shallow skiff appeared to be meanly-clad, the clothing even appeared to flutter in rags, though it was so distant from her, and it had by this time grown so dark in consequence of a mass of dark cloud obscuring the setting sun, that it was but dimly perceptible.

She watched until the canoe reached the shore on the opposite side, at a considerable distance down the stream, and was again on the point of returning, when the mysterious occupant of the canoe leaped on shore, and turned round, as if to see whether he was still pursued. At that moment the setting sun shone forth from beneath the black clouds, its bright parting rays gleaming full upon the face of the figure. It appeared to Louisa that she could distinctly trace every feature, so strong was the contrast of the light resting upon the face with the dusky gloom of everything around, and to her horror and dismay the features were those of her deceased father.

In that respect she could not be mistaken, though a long white beard descended to the waist, and the face was overgrown with grizzled whiskers and worn into furrows which had never disfigured the smooth visage of Mr. Manners, when in life. And then, perhaps it was the peculiar light shed upon it which caused the pallor, but it was deadly pale and yellow like that of a corpse! For a moment the figure remained standing, gazing intently upon her, then it disappeared.

Louisa felt as if she would sink to the earth with affright; the perspiration stood in beadlike drops upon her forehead, and she stood rooted to the spot, unable to move a limb. In a short time, however, she gathered courage and fled rapidly homeward, fancying every moment that she was pursued, and when, at length, she entered the door of her cottage, she fell fainting into Mrs. Brady's arms.

When she recovered, the housekeeper pressed her earnestly to tell what had caused her alarm; but she would only say that she had been, perhaps foolishly, frightened by the appearance of a stranger in the wood.

When at night she retired to the solitude of her own chamber, she began to reflect upon what she had seen. Was it a supernatural appearance or not? she asked herself. That the figure had her father's features, she was certain; they were too firmly impressed upon her memory, even if his death had not been so recent, to be erased. But then the features were more aged, their expression more careworn than her father's had been; and together with the hoary beard and grizzled whiskers, they resembled those of a much more aged man. If it were possible for her deceased parent to appear supernaturally before her, why should he come in that guise and in that place? Why should he retreat from her? Why, if indeed he had appeared, did he not make himself and his object known?

Her deep-rooted repugnance to living upon an income obtained by means of a life insurance at one moment almost induced her to believe that her father had, in truth, appeared to reproach her for what she still considered to be heartlessness on her part—a sort of trading upon the duration of the life of those whom we love. But then, she thought, "Did not he insist upon insuring his life against my wishes? Was it not that in case events should occur which would bring me otherwise to want—as, alas, they have occurred!—that he acted as he did? I am fulfilling his wishes—sadly against my own will, it is true—but his wishes still. Surely he would not come forth from his watery grave to reproach me for acting thus!"

Taking into account the shabby, ragged attire and the dishevelled appearance of the figure which had alarmed her, she at length came to the conclusion that the mysterious visitant was no apparition from the tomb, but some poor man—perhaps a beggar—and that the singular likeness to her father was an accidental resemblance, one of those freaks of nature which sometimes startle us as we pass through a crowded thoroughfare, and fancy for a moment that we see in some passer-by the features of a friend far distant, or long ago passed away to another sphere of existence.

"But if a beggar," she reasoned, "why did he not ask for alms? Why does he come secretly to watch me in the lonely woods?" And she shuddered at the thought that probably she had been watched and waited for by some escaped lunatic from a mad-house!

She resolved never again to go into the woods alone. But others of the household went, and once the housekeeper herself, at length convinced, asserted that she had seen the figure of the old man.

It wanted now but a few weeks to the expiration of the probationary twelvemonth. One night Louisa, tempted by the serene beauty of the moonlit, starlit sky, after preparing herself for bed, seated herself at the half-open lattice window, and drank in the fragrant sweetness and freshness of the summer night-air, wafted from the flower-beds in the garden.

While thus she sat, deeply absorbed in thought, a slight rustling noise in the garden caught her ear. She glanced in that direction, and saw distinctly the figure of the old man whom she had seen in the wood. He stood gazing intently towards her. The moon gave sufficient light to enable her to scan his features and his entire form, and she was convinced they were those of her father. Observing that he was noticed, he retreated; and she now remarked that the gait of the old man was that of him she had loved so dearly. He was more bent and his steps were feeble, and his matted whiskers, long beard and mean attire imparted an appearance of abject poverty; but that it was no supernatural appearance, but the father, in life, whom she had mourned so long as dead, she could no longer doubt. A terrible thought came for the first time across her mind. It was overwhelming, in its horror. Could it be possible that her father, in his intense love for her, and knowing that his failure was at hand and his ruin irretrievable, had so far smothered his sense of rectitude, his regard of honor, that uprightness and integrity which had guided him in every movement of his life, as to voluntarily and deliberately descend to perpetrate a fraud upon the insurance office? and, by causing it to be believed that he was dead, contrive to secure to her a sum of money which would save her from the poverty into which she would otherwise be plunged, and which he was willing to bear himself, could he only place her beyond its influence? The thought almost drove her mad. If such was the case, was she not a party to the fraud? Had she not obtained money under false pretences, and was she not now living in comfort upon its proceeds? True, she was unwittingly a participant in the crime; but she felt no less the stigma that it would attach to her name, and the self-abasement which it would bring upon herself!

"O," she murmured, "this is terrible beyond endurance! Can it be true? Pray God I am mistaken; but if it be true, what can I do? How can I act? I cannot, dare not continue to perpetrate the crime; and to make it known, would be to criminate my own father! But I will know!" she continued; "I will know whether it be true or false! I will be satisfied—and at once. I could not live in doubt, in such a case as this."

She rose from her seat and commenced hastily to dress herself, resolved to go into the garden and confront the old man, and be fully satisfied, at once and forever, whether he was actually her father, or some one whose features and form and gait were alike counterparts of those of him she had believed dead.

The figure retreated, turned back, stood still and hesitated, then moved a few paces forward, as if, perceiving that he had been recognized, he was irresolute whether to approach or flee from her whom, to look upon, he had crept out, like a thief, in the dark midnight.

In a few moments, Louisa was sufficiently dressed, and she hurried out into the garden. The figure had disappeared. She went to the gate and passed down the lawn, and across the fields, but no living creature was to be seen. She called aloud, though in a smothered voice: "Father! Father!" But there came no response, and she again doubted whether it had not been a mere phantasy of the imagination. It seemed so natural, so true, she could not bring herself to believe so, and yet she felt what a relief such a belief would be to her.

There was nothing left but to return to the cottage. Again she seated herself by the open window; but she saw the figure no more, and at length she closed the lattice and retired to bed—but not to sleep. Her mind was too full of what she had seen or fancied. If, she thought, she were to be continually subject to these frequently recurring phantasies, it would be terrible—more terrible still, if what she dreaded were true!

Hours passed away, and at length, wearied with racking thought, she closed her eyes and slept uneasily, and dreamed frightful dreams. She was awakened from one of these by a noise beneath the window. Her heart palpitating violently, she lay and listened, fearful to get out of bed; but hearing the noise no longer, she began to think she had been mistaken, and again closed her eyes and slumbered.

Again she was startled from her sleep, and this time she saw the nose flattened against the window, the face she had seen in the garden and on the banks of the streamlet—her father's face—peering into the apartment! She almost screamed with affright, but she had sense to think of the dread exposure that must ensue, if other than herself recognized the features of the midnight visitor, and that fear kept her silent; but she sprang up in bed, and at the same moment a voice—a voice whose accents she well knew, whispered: "Louisa! Louisa!"

The next moment she was out of bed and at the window, the quilt thrown over her like a cloak.

"O, father, father!" she murmured. "Why—what is this?"

She had opened the casement, and the old man, clad in rags, stood in the centre of the room.

In spite of his squalid aspect, in spite of her terrors, and her sense of the great wrong her father had done himself and her, she threw herself into his arms, and parent and daughter clung in a long, close embrace. In the darkness and silence of the night, in the unlighted bed-chamber of his daughter, the unhappy, erring father told his sad tale. It may be recapitulated in a few words:

Conscious that his affairs were irretrievably involved, and desirous, at any risk to himself, of saving his cherished child from the stings of poverty, he had made up his mind to lead people to suppose he had met his death by drowning; knowing that if that were credited, his daughter would receive the money from the insurance office.

To that end, he had spoken cheerfully to some friends he met, and informed them that he was going to bathe. He had provided himself with a disguise, and had put into his pocket as large a sum of money for his immediate support, as he could collect and withdraw from the firm, without raising suspicion, in the short time he had for preparation. On arriving at the spot where for years he had been accustomed to bathe, he had stripped himself of his garments and arrayed himself in the disguise he had brought with him, and with five hundred dollars in his pocket, had escaped into Canada. There he had read in the newspapers all the reports of his supposed suicide, his failure, and the subsequent discovery of his garments, the testimony of his friends, and the change in public opinion which led people to imagine that he had been accidentally drowned. Then he knew his daughter would obtain the insurance money, and he was satisfied.

He had hoped, by living frugally upon the smallest possible sum that would procure him the plainest food, that his money would last for years, if not for the remainder of his wretched life; and he thought that, knowing that his child would be provided for, he could live absent from her without wishing to see her again. But parental instinct was too powerful to be controlled. He had not been six months in Canada, before he felt a craving to see his daughter once again, which he could not overcome. He came to New York, still in disguise, and though not yet in a state of abject poverty, obliged to half starve himself day by day, lest he should find himself altogether destitute. He discovered where his daughter had taken up her residence, and learning that she occasionally walked in the woods, he crept thither in the hope of seeing her at a distance, though but for a moment. He spoke of the day on which she discovered his presence, and how he had avoided her, and explained how he seemed to walk without noise over the ground, and paddle across the water, by telling her that to avoid discovery he walked the woods in his stocking feet, and muffled the paddles of the skiff.

But after that day, he saw her in the woods no more, and after having waited until he grew almost desperate, he ventured into the garden. Often, unobserved himself, he had seen her at the window; but this night he was discovered. He could endure it no longer. He resolved to make himself known to her, to clasp her in his embrace once again, and then to go forth—and die. He had found a ladder, used for climbing trees in the garden, that he had placed under the window. (It was the noise occasioned by this movement which had at first awakened Louisa from her slumbers.) He had then waited awhile to gain courage for the effort; had climbed the ladder, and looked in at the window. He was looking in when she awoke and discovered him.

"And now, Louisa, darling," said he, "one more kiss for your miserable father, and he will go hence to trouble you no more."

"Not so—O, not so, father!" sobbed Louisa, as she clung to his bosom. "And yet," she added, "how terrible this is! It is like a horrible dream. Father, you must not remain here, or you will be arrested. O, it is dreadful! Father, dear father, how could you thus imperil yourself for me? I could have borne poverty with you; but this robbery—it is nought else—will cling to me like a curse."

And she thought to herself, though she would not express her thoughts aloud:

"It is so mean—so contemptible! I would sooner have committed a burglary, than have been party to such an act of despicable swindling." (It was a terrible thought to occupy the mind of a daughter—to be alike ashamed of the crime committed by her father, and of the means by which it was committed.)

"Father," she continued, after a pause, "you must go hence—go back to Canada. Take with you what money I have got in the house. It is not mine, but that of the insurance company; but, though I know it is wrong, I will hand it over to you on such an occasion as this. You must go to-night—to-night, before daylight appears—and—to-morrow I will go to the insurance office and ask to see the president. I will tell him all, and beg him to keep the money I have not used. Thank Heaven, I have spent less than one year's interest; and I will beseech him, for a ruined old man's, for a wretched daughter's sake, to keep the matter secret, and forbear to prosecute. And, father, you must write and let me know when you are in Canada; and when this affair is settled, I will come to you there, and work for your support. We will live henceforward together, poor—perhaps as poor as we well may be, and live—but, with the blessing of God, we may yet be happy."

Again she clung to the old man in a close embrace, and then forcing what money she had in the house upon him, urged his immediate departure.

Mr. Manners endeavored to expostulate with her. "I will go, Louisa," he said; "I will go, my child. You shall be troubled with your old father no more. But reflect, before you consign yourself to poverty! I perceive now how great has been my guilt; but you have been guilty of no crime, my poor child! And what is the trifle you possess to a wealthy company? they will not feel its loss."

"Father," said Louisa, "do not argue thus; you shock me. I have as yet been guiltless of crime; but I should be an accomplice to-morrow, if I forbore to give up the money. And perhaps some day the fraud would be discovered—and what would be then your fate, and mine?"

Still the old man argued; but his daughter refused to listen, and at length he took his departure, telling her that he would be in Canada before twenty-four hours had passed away.

Poor Louisa did not attempt to sleep again that night. The day-dawn found her still sitting at the casement window from which she had watched the departure of her father—her weak, misguided, and now care-worn, toil-worn father—grown prematurely old and gray, with the weight of a heavy crime, and the remorse that ever follows crime, save in the most conscience-seared of men—but her father, still!

Unhappy girl! She had reason for deep thought and bitter sorrow. Forever—so it seemed to her—she had lost the betrothed husband, to whom she was so soon to have been united! She could not hold him bound to keep the promise he had renewed and kept, when poverty threatened to assail her, now that she was poor indeed, and, worse than poor, an accomplice, though an innocent one, in a great and base crime! She resolved that she would tell him all, and then go to the directors of the insurance office and relate her sad story to them, and then—what then, she knew not. She could but trust in God, and await his will!

The morrow came, and with a heavy heart she took the cars to the city at an early hour, without explaining to Mrs. Brady the object of her journey; went to the bank and sought an interview with Ralph, and told him all that had occurred, concealing nothing.

"And now, dear Ralph," she said, "farewell forever!"

The tears she had long endeavored to suppress now burst forth in spite of her endeavors, and she sobbed aloud, as she added:

"Ralph—this is the last time I shall call you by that dear, familiar name—you have behaved nobly, most generously towards me. You wooed me when I was your equal in wealth and social position; and when poverty and trouble assailed me, though with a breaking heart I offered to release you if you wished, you kept true to your promise, and loved me still. But now—now how can I dare to hope, to expect that you should lower yourself to wed—O, God! that I should be compelled to say the words!—the destitute child of—a fugitive criminal!"

"And why, Louisa," said the young man, "is it the last time that you should call me by the name of Ralph? and why should you release me from my vows? There are two persons to be consulted respecting that. I shall not release you, Louisa; I do not choose to give up my future wife now, when I have more than ever reason to love her and to admire and respect the motives which actuate her conduct."

He took Louisa's hand, which she freely resigned to him. Her heart was too full to permit her to speak, and Ralph continued:

"I perfectly agree with you, Louisa, as to the course you have determined to take, and I respect you for it. So far from lowering you in my esteem, it has greatly exalted you; and, take my word for it, it will also exalt you in the eyes of the president of the life insurance company. A new president has been appointed since the insurance was paid, who is a worthy man, and a most intimate friend of mine. You shall not visit him alone; I will go with you. You shall tell the story, if you can; if not, I will tell it for you. Believe me, there is no cause for alarm. Have no fear for your father, or of any unpleasant exposure. Before an hour has passed over our heads, the money shall be quietly restored and you will quit the office, having made a new and a valuable friend."

It is sufficient to say that the young banker accompanied his betrothed to the insurance office. They had an interview with the president, who listened to the tale they had to tell, and when it was ended, warmly expressed his admiration of Louisa's conduct, and promised inviolable secrecy. He shook hands with both the young people; and having learned from some words which inadvertently slipped from Ralph's tongue that he was engaged to be married to the young lady, he playfully congratulated him upon the coming event, and upon his choice of a lady who, independently of her personal attractions, had shown so firm, just, honest and decided moral qualities.

"Then you promise that you will not cast me off, Louisa," said Ralph, playfully, as they walked slowly back to the bank.

"Not if you insist on binding me to my promise," replied Louisa, blushing, and smiling through the tears that she had scarcely yet dried.

"And since your father is living, I see no reason for further delay," returned Ralph. "Why not hasten the day, Louisa?"

"You forget, Ralph," she replied, "that my poor, unhappy father, though living—and I thank God that he is—is dead to the world. What would be said if—"

She ceased suddenly, but the young man understood her.

"You are right, Louisa," said he, "and I was wrong, very wrong to speak as I did. I forgot myself, in my happiness in having you by my side, and feeling how much cause I had for congratulation, after what has passed between us to-day, in my choice of a wife. But I hold you bound to the day previously appointed."

Louisa blushed assent.

"And," continued Ralph, "I think for the short period that will intervene between this and the day on which I shall claim you for my bride, you had better remain in the cottage where you now reside; and, Louisa, until I am your husband, you must let me be your banker."

On the appointed day, the wedding took place, and Louisa, with Mrs. Brady, who had been her friend in adversity, removed from the little cottage to the spacious mansion provided for her reception by her husband.

Mr. Manners wrote a sadly desponding letter to his daughter from Canada, to which she promptly replied, explaining all that had occurred after his departure on the night when he held an interview with her in her bed-room at the cottage, and how happily everything had been completed. Ralph settled a liberal income upon the poor, broken down old man, whom he and his wife would gladly have welcomed as a permanent guest at their own happy home, had such an arrangement been possible under the peculiar circumstances, and frequently Louisa paid him long visits; but he only lived three years after his return to Canada. With the return of comfort and ease, after his long privations, came a keen feeling of remorse caused by his criminal folly and weakness, which hurried him to the grave.

After his death, the facts which I have recorded became known by slow degrees; but time and the grave had softened down all hostile feeling toward the poor old man, who had, until evil days came upon him, and intense love for his only child had warped his moral perceptions, borne, for so many years, so high a character. And the story, though the facts were distorted, redounded, in the opinion of the world (since she was happy and prosperous, and had no need of its sympathy), greatly to Louisa's credit; and Ralph, now a happy husband and father, as well as a wealthy New England citizen, has never had cause to regret that he twice refused to be released from the promises he made on the day of his betrothal.

A CURIOUS JEWISH LEGEND.

Titus passed through what had been Jerusalem after its destruction. It is said that the sight of the ruins filled with sorrow and awe the conqueror, in whose character, according to the statement of contemporaries, good and evil strangely alternated. A Jewish legend has embellished this circumstance by describing in the most fabulous terms certain tortures which Titus had to endure in punishment for the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. On his voyage from Egypt to Italy (so goes the story), Titus was overtaken by a storm, which threatened to destroy the vessel that bore him. Conscious of the righteous anger of the God of Israel whom he had offended, Titus broke forth in blasphemies against him, as if his power were limited to the sea, in which he had once destroyed Pharaoh, and now threatened his own safety, while he was unable successfully to contend against him upon land. A voice from on high rebuked the blasphemy. The storm was hushed; but no sooner had Titus landed than he felt excruciating pains in his head, occasioned, as it afterwards turned out, by an insect gnawing on his brain, which, according to the Divine threatening, was to continue his tormentor through life. Only once, and for a short time, the noise from a blacksmith's shop caused the insect to desist. On his deathbed, Titus ordered the physicians after his decease to open his skull, in order to ascertain the occasion of this ceaseless agony. To their astonishment they discovered in it an animal, which had grown to the size of a swallow, two talents in weight, with metal bill and claws, that had gnawed at the emperor's brain.—Hebraist.

STORM ON THE MOUNTAIN.

The sky is changed—and such a change! O night,
And storm, and darkness! ye are wondrous strong,
Yet lovely in your strength, as is the light
Of a dark eye in woman. Far along,
From peak to peak, the rattling crags among Leaps the live thunder.

BYRON.

MY PLOTTING AND PLANNING, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY MARTHA K. ANNABLE.

At eighteen I was pretty, wealthy and spoiled. Pretty! Certainly I was if my mirror told the truth; pretty—if my five hundred and five dear, true, devoted friends and admirers were honest in their declarations; pretty—if a rose and lily complexion, eyes of the merriest hazel, lips full and smiling, and of the richest carnation, features finely cut, well defined, and framed in by the softest and most luxuriant golden brown curls, could entitle one to be called pretty.

Secondly, wealthy. Now I wasn't what you may term an heiress, perhaps, gentle reader, or avaricious fortune-seeker—yet I had been liberally educated, was surrounded with elegance, and even luxury, and besides being my father's only heiress (and he was a comfortable merchant of liberal means), by the generosity of an uncle, I was to come into possession of twenty thousand dollars upon my twenty-first birthday.

Spoiled. No one but myself dared whisper such a thing, yet I am confident such was the fact—that I was spoiled. Do you differ with me, reader? If so, perhaps my story will convince you of your error and my correctness. Now it is very evident if my nature had not been very depraved, when my father informed me upon my eighteenth birthday—the 11th of May, 1858—that I was betrothed in my early childhood to a certain Harry Sanford, the only son of a wealthy friend of my father's—I say if my nature had not been exceedingly depraved, of course I would have acquiesced in this arrangement, with many thanks to my father for his kind forethought, and with many self-congratulations as to the good fortune in store for me.

Owing to the depravity of my heart, however, I declared to my father that I would never marry Mr. Harry Sanford if he was rich as Cræsus, handsome as Apollo, or a very Cicero for eloquence (he was a lawyer by the way). No—marry Mr. Harry Sanford I would not! Why? For the simple reason, I wouldn't—so the matter was settled.

I had seen Mr. Harry seven or eight years before, a green, awkward, shy lad—and so I intimated to my father strongly that the idea of my marrying him was preposterous.

"My dear,"—that was the way my father always addressed me—"my dear, you are very positive. Hadn't you better wait until you see

Mr. Harry Sanford, for you know eight years makes quite a difference—"

I interrupted him very impolitely—but then, you know I said I was spoiled.

"I don't care for the difference."

"You are very set," said my father, with a flushed face.

I laughed a little, as I replied:

"When I marry any one, it will be somebody who cares more for me than my money, and does not wed me because his father and my father designed us for each other."

"But supposing Harry should really love you, pet?"

"It would be all the same," I answered, carelessly tying the silken cord of my morning-dress into knots and then untying them. "Pray, let us change the subject, papa, for I shall never become Mrs. Harry Sanford, depend upon it."

Now my father was a very determined man in his way, and he had set himself too much upon this favorite plan of his to have it thwarted so easily. So after spending an hour in a fruitless endeavor to persuade me to receive the young gentleman's addresses, he suddenly enough changed from coaxing to threatening, called me an ungrateful trollop, an impudent, senseless flirt of a girl, and ended by informing me that unless I consented to meet Mr. Harry Sanford with becoming respect, he would have me locked in my chamber and fed on bread and water until I did come sufficiently to my senses to do so.

Now I suppose papa thought this would humble me, but again the depravity of my heart caused me to answer that I should never treat Mr. Harry Sanford otherwise than with the most studied and profound contempt. So the next morning I found my door locked upon the outside, and a loaf of bread and pitcher of water upon the table, to answer the purpose of breakfast, dinner and supper for me. Now here was a fix! I—pretty Agnes Thorne, a prisoner, and put upon an allowance of bread and water, which treatment I had no reason to expect would be mitigated until I consented to receive Mr. Harry Sanford as my affianced husband! Some girls would have sat down and cried over the untoward state of affairs, but I did not care to spend my time, spoil my eyes, or waste my tears thus. So I sat down coolly and deliberately to think. In the first place I came to the conclusion I would never receive the attentions of Mr. Harry Sanford—never. Secondly, that as for remaining a close prisoner for an incalculable length of time, that would be almost insufferable, as the warm season was coming on, and there was no one who loved romping, free air and equestrian expeditions better than I did. No, it never would do to be thus incarcerated a whole summer, and perhaps longer, that was not to be thought of. Now women are famous for planning, and it did not require ten minutes for pretty little Agnes Thorne to lay out a decided plan of action.

My first movements were to make my toilet; my next to eat my plain but wholesome breakfast; my next to put my room in order; and then I sat down to sewing as composedly as if the door was not locked upon the outside, and the key no doubt safe in my father's pocket; as composedly as if there was not a cunningly devised plan laid snugly away in my busy brain, only waiting for a suitable time to be put into execution by me.

Two or three times that day my father came to my door and tapped, asking if I were not beginning to repent of my folly. But my answer evidently did not satisfy him, for he allowed the door to remain closed. Once my mother tried to expostulate with me upon my folly—but I more than half believe she sympathized with me in my trial too much to have a great deal to say, as she never took sides against my father. I have often admired her for this. I admired her for it even then—my dear mother!

How long that day seemed; it appeared to me that night, cool and starry, would never come. When the shades of evening, however, did begin to approach, I donned my plainest dress, an unpretending debaige, and linen cuffs and collar—looked over my wardrobe, laying out such articles of clothing as I deemed would be most serviceable to me, and rolled them tightly into a bundle—then I placed a purse containing quite a liberal supply of spending money in my pocket, and was ready for my adventure.

My plan was this. Some fifty miles distant from the village in which my father lived, dwelt his sister and her husband, two quiet old-fashioned people enjoying themselves like princes out there in their little vine-shaded country house, away from the busy turmoil of the city, of the gossip and heart-burnings of a village.

Uncle George and Aunt Martha had often invited me to visit them, and it now entered my willful brain to accept their invitation, and by doing so to foil my father in his grand scheme of bringing about a meeting between Harry Sanford and myself, the young man in question having written that he would do himself the honor of spending the summer at my father's, and I knew that the said Mr. Harry Sanford intended visiting Europe in the fall; so if I could only keep out of his way that summer, I felt that the Rubicon would be past, and that for some time at least I should be left free.

So far so good—now to escape from my prison. My father, flattering himself that the only manner of egress from my chamber was through the door, forgot that though my window was in the second story, a couple of sheets tied together and fastened securely to the bed-post, would serve as well as a ladder for his romp of an Agnes Thorne. That, however, was my intended manner of escape; but as I was about putting it in execution a new difficulty arose in my mind. My mother always before retiring to rest, peeped in to see that I was safely ensconced in bed. At first, I thought of waiting until she had looked in and discovered all to be right. Then recollecting that I must be at the station at ten o'clock, I put that suggestion aside as impracticable.

Then what should I do? I knew that if she looked in and discovered the room to be empty, she would raise the alarm immediately, and I might be overtaken before I had put myself on board the cars en route for my country relatives' hospitable mansion. What should I do?

But when was ever a woman's ingenuity put at fault? "Necessity is the mother of invention," is an old adage, and it was not long before this difficulty also was removed. It required but a moment to roll some articles of wearing apparel into the shape of a person; this I placed in bed, put a delicate nightcap upon the counterfeit head, turning the face towards the wall. This done, I placed a little note that I had written during the day upon the table, where it would be likely to be found in the morning, and then, highly elated at my successfully laid plans, I made my somewhat perilous descent.

The note that I left for the consolation of my parents was brief, and read as follows:

"DEAR PARENTS: Not particularly fancying its cage, your bird has flown. Don't be uneasy, she will return to you when that odious Harry Sanford is out at sea. Till then adieu. AGGIE."

Of course my Uncle George and Aunt Martha were glad to see me. I arrived at their country seat when it was nearly evening the next day, tired and hungry enough, I assure you. Aunt Martha helped me to alight from the lumbering old stage-coach, while Uncle George (hale, hearty, dear old man—portly, and as warm-hearted as he was portly) came down the path, rubbing his chubby hands together, saying:

"Well, well, bless my old eyes! Is it going to rain, Aggie Thorne, or what is going to happen? Here, let me take your bundle, child, and do you, Martha, get her some supper—she's nearly starved, I'll wager."

I followed the dear old people along the gravelled walk, up the broad steps, through the great sheltering porch, and into the pleasant, old-fashioned parlor. Then I sank down into the depths of a great, cushioned rocker, while Uncle George unfastened my bonnet and shawl, and laying them upon the chintz-covered lounge, sat down to catechize me.

"Come alone, Aggie!"

"Yes, sir."

I knew what was coming. I might better have attempted to deceive myself than keensighted Uncle George. I knew this to begin with, but I was more sensible of the fact, when, ten minutes later, I discovered I had "let the cat out of the bag;" in other words, that Uncle George had possessed himself of all the principal facts connected with my proceedings the previous thirty-six hours.

"Well, well, I can't say that I blame you, lass," he said, after he had fully satisfied his curiosity. I noticed that there was a peculiar twinkle in his eyes, but then Uncle George had very peculiar eyes, perhaps it was only my imagination that made me think I saw anything unusual in their expression.

As I said, Uncle George was a hale, hearty old man, I think at that time about sixty years of age. A good looking old man he was too, and I have heard Aunt Martha say, very handsome in his youth. She, dear soul, was ten years his junior, a pleasant-featured, mild-eyed old lady, invariably dressed in black or gray, with silver-bowed spectacles, and cap and kerchief always so snowy and spotless, and as I entered the dining-room that evening and sat down to the bountifully spread table, with Aunt Martha sitting directly opposite, I thought how very happily her life must have passed, to leave her face so calm and beautiful in old age. I do not know but what I envied Aunt Martha, and would have been willing to have bartered my youth for her quiet old age, if her placid happiness could be mine by the exchange. Aunt Martha, like a dear, discreet old lady, did not quiz me in the least. She talked of her garden, the prospect of fruit, the price of butter and eggs, and the beautiful and seasonable weather. If I was in a manner uncomfortable after Uncle George's catechizing, Aunt Martha rendered me perfectly at my ease, and I forgot my former discomfort.

"Wasn't I tired and sleepy?"

I acknowledged it, for in reality I was. What a cool, spacious spare room that was, Aunt Martha conducted me into with its straw carpeting, dimity hangings and snowy draped bed.

"Good night, child." And Aunt Martha kissed me in a tender, motherly way.

"And be sure and take notice what you dream, Aggie!" called my uncle's voice up the stairway; "for you know the first dream you dream in a strange house will come true as sure as anything in the world."

And I did dream—horror of horrors!—and what do you suppose it was about? Will you believe it? but I thought I was married to the ugliest ogre in Christendom, and the said ogre's name was Harry Sanford! I awoke in a tremendous perspiration, persuaded myself I had had the nightmare, and went to sleep again to dream that I was the horrible ogre, and Harry Sanborn was little Aggie Thorne, and that the said ogre and the said Aggie were one! I awoke all in a tremble, to hear the roosters crowing for morning, and to find daylight streaming in through the white curtains.

Now it is not necessary for the development of my story for me to particularize the events of the few succeeding days, or even weeks. My time would have passed pleasantly enough, but for one or two things. In the first place, I was more conscious than ever of the fact that I was a spoiled girl. Secondly, I had a very, very little wish to know how matters were progressing at home. Besides, I was somewhat ennuied, and when I learned that there was to be an addition to our family in the shape of a handsome young fellow, the schoolmaster of the district, I can't say that I was sorry.

Will Ford and I soon became the best of friends. I can't tell why, unless because my Uncle George called him a blockhead, and my Aunt Martha intimated rather strongly to me that she hoped I would not have a great deal to say to the thriftless fellow, who, although he did well enough for the teacher of two scores of juveniles, was not the most suitable company in the world for pretty, wealthy, accomplished Agnes Thorne. I say that may be the reason even now, I cannot say. Strange how little we know of our own hearts!

Now, why my uncle and aunt so disliked the young pedagogue of the district, I could not discover. I must say they were even rude to him, rude—even Uncle George, dear, hospitable Uncle George, and my pleasant, even-tempered Aunt Martha. Of course I felt very sorry for him, and mortified that he should be obliged to submit to such treatment on my account, and the smiles they denied him, I fully made up to him.

One evening my aunt called me when I was enjoying just one of the pleasantest tete-a-tetes in the world with Will, upon the front piazza.

"The night air isn't good for you, Agnes," she said, somewhat sternly. "And as for Mr. Ford, I should think the labors of the day would require him to devote more hours to sleep. Good night, sir." And my Aunt Martha taking my hand, led me rather forcibly into the sitting-room and closed the door.

To say that I was angry would be too mild an expression. I had my father's quick, passionate temperament, and the idea that she should thus endeavor to control my actions maddened me. I went to the open window and looked out. I saw Will walking back and forth beneath the great locust trees, moody and abstracted, his arms folded across his breast, and his eyes fixed upon the ground. I was in no mood to conciliate my aunt, who was evidently very much vexed with me, so I commenced singing:

"O meet me down by the willow tree."

I knew Will heard me, for he looked up, smiled, and answered by deaf and dumb signs, which we both understood.

"I will—in an hour. Remember, Aggie."

I did remember. I pleaded fatigue to my aunt and retired, but to steal from my room little more than half an hour afterwards, and creeping noiselessly down stairs, I wandered out into the moonlight.

What a beautiful night it was, the breezes sighing through the locusts, and lifting the graceful arms of the eglantine that clambered over the great porch. I raised my face to the perfumed breath of the flowers, seeking to inhale a double portion of their fragrance as I passed. The dew lay glittering like pearls upon the grass, the whippoorwill was trilling his sad, plaintive song over the hill, and there beneath the quiet stars, under the sweeping branches of the willow tree, at the further end of Uncle George's garden, in a whisper, lest his words might be overheard by those who sought to separate us—in a whisper to be sure—yet there was no need of words, so eloquent was the look that beamed from his clear, handsome eyes—there and then he told me of his love, and I—I promised to be his wife!

Our interview was a long one. What wonder? How many plans we laid—how much I had to tell him, and he to make known to me! I told him all about my leaving home—that obnoxious Harry Sanford to whom my father had betrothed me. And when he asked me:

"But, Aggie, darling, would you choose the poor pedagogue, rather than the wealthy lover your father has chosen for you?" I replied unhesitatingly:

"As truly as I pledged myself to be yours forever, Will."

He went on in his low, musical way, his arms around me, his clear, earnest eyes gazing into my own.

"For your sake, Aggie, I would like to be rich, that I might surround you with luxury and elegance." (I had never intimated to Will that I was to come into possession of a single copper, either upon my majority, or my father's death, leaving him to surmise that I was as penniless as himself.)

"Never mind," I said. How brave I was, wasn't I, when I knew all the while there were some twenty thousand dollars to come into possession of a certain Agnes Thorne, upon her twenty-first birthday.

"Never mind, dear Will," was my brave speech, "I can endure poverty with all its ills for your sake!"

He did not look at me, as I concluded; perhaps it was well for me he did not, at least, I thought so at the time, for I knew there was a glad, triumphant expression upon my countenance that I could not conceal, and which I feared would betray me.

Now I knew my father well enough to know that a certain refusal would meet the request of my lover if he petitioned for my hand, and I had no intention of allowing Uncle George and Aunt Martha to have the satisfaction of saying "no" to any appeal of his to them. So it was all arranged for an elopement, to come off the very next evening. Will was to have a carriage in waiting at a certain spot designated, where I was to meet him at midnight, and then as fast as possible we were to set off to a neighboring State, where a special license would be unnecessary, and we could be united before a pursuit could be instituted.

And with this understanding we parted. The next day passed away without anything of note transpiring. Will and I merely spoke with each other, and that was all, for we wished entirely to disarm my uncle and aunt of any suspicion they might have in regard to their dutiful niece.

Night came at length—starless, moonless. How I congratulated myself upon the favorableness of the evening for our purpose! At the appointed hour, dressed with more than ordinary care, I glided down stairs and out into the night. I met Will at the spot designated; the carriage was in waiting, he assisted me in, gave a few directions to the driver, seated himself by my side, put up the door, and then we were off, whirled rapidly away over the turnpike. We were both silent for a long time, Will and I. Finally, however, he spoke. There was a strange quivering in his voice:

"Aggie," he said, "you are sure that you love me? Are you sure that you will not regret this step? It is not too late to go back. I could not have the heart to bind you down to a life of poverty with me unless you deliberately make the choice yourself, with your eyes open, realizing what you are doing."

"Poverty with you would be preferable to wealth and luxury with any other," I answered, while there was a great exultant throb of my heart when I thought of the surprise in store for my true, devoted lover, who loved me for myself alone. Then I thought of my father, mother, uncle and aunt, and Harry Sanford. I laughed a little to myself. I said I was a spoiled girl—and I was. How my father would rave, wouldn't he, to be sure, when he found he had been outwitted? But then, it was his own doings. If he hadn't shut me up and fed me on bread and water, I never would have given him Will for a son-in-law, I reasoned with myself, and feeling quite satisfied with the course I was pursuing, I nestled my head down upon Will's shoulder, and went to sleep.

"Here we are at last, Aggie."

These were the words that aroused me, and half-bewildered, I suffered myself to be taken from the carriage and assisted up a flight of broad stone steps, into a wide hall, dimly lighted, and from thence into a large, well-furnished room, very dimly illuminated indeed, by a night lamp. As I looked around, a sudden bewilderment came over me. I thought for a moment that I was the victim of some delusive, inconsistent dream. I rubbed my eyes and pinched myself, to see if I was awake, and finding that I was, I was about turning to Will, with a question already framed upon my lips, when the door opened, and an old man, whom Will whispered me was the justice, entered.

Now there were several things that amazed me. First, the room I was in had a strangely familiar look; secondly, there was a curious twinkling in the eye of the justice; thirdly, I heard sounds of suppressed mirth, and whisperings in a dim corner of the room; and fourthly, my dear Will was addressed by the justice, when he asked him if he would take me to be his lawfully wedded wife, as William Henry Sanford. What a name, I thought to myself, what a name! Although my thoughts were of a very strange nature, my misgivings were not definite enough to cause me to stay the proceedings, and—yes, almost before I knew it, I heard the justice say:

"I pronounce you man and wife."

At that moment, as if by magic, the great room became suddenly illuminated, and— There stood my father and mother, laughing and chatting with my good Uncle George and Aunt Martha—and—could it be?—yes, surely it was the real sober fact—we had been married in Uncle George's parlor!

"Allow me to congratulate you, Aggie, upon your very wise choice," said my father, advancing. "And upon the success of your elopement," smiled my mother, while my Uncle George looked at me with a knowing twinkle in his eye, and my Aunt Martha, dear soul, laughed until the tears ran down her cheeks.

"Sold!" I pronounced the word bitterly, as my father clasped my husband's hand warmly, saying:

"You've won her, Harry—cleverly won her—but I dare say she isn't worth the trouble you've had in the winning!"

Of course, I tried to be very angry, when I discovered the ruse. Of course I raved and stormed, and declared I would have awful and terrible revenge, but—

Here I am—little Harry looking out of the window and calling papa and I—the happiest little wife in Christendom, I subscribe my name Mrs. William Harry Sanford.

TRUE AND FALSE GOOD BREEDING.

It is truly said that a little gentility is a dangerous thing. There are no such sticklers for etiquette as the would-be fashionable, who have heard of good society, but have never seen it. Having no innate good-breeding, they hedge in their lives with conventionalities and rules borrowed from the Handbook of Politeness. It is unsafe to do an original and spontaneous act in their presence, or let fall a remark that's not correctly commonplace, if you would beware of offending their fastidiousness. On the other hand, there's no such freedom anywhere as in really good society. Truly well-bred persons never act by rule, or fear giving offence by the freedom of their conduct and conversation. It is the high tone of their behaviour that preserves them from vulgarity, not the observance of etiquette. Innate politeness and nobility of character show themselves in every gesture, in every accent of the voice and glance of the eye; humble dress and occupation cannot conceal them; neither can vulgarity put on those high qualities, though it be clad in purple and gold, and housed in a palace.—Home Journal.

AFFECTION.

Talk not of wasted affection—affection never was wasted; If it enrich not the heart of another, its waters returning Back to their springs, like the rain, shall fill them full of refreshment:
That which the fountain sheds forth returns again to the fountain.
Patience—accomplish thy labor—accomplish thy work of affection!
Sorrow and silence are strong, and patient endurance is godlike. LONGFELLOW.

DREAM-LAND VISIONS.

BY FANNY FIELDING.

How sweetly to my wearied brain
Comes floating, borne by angel wings,
A low and musical refrain,
To charm my soul from earthly things.
It bids me throw earth-cares away,
And soar into the realms of light;
Forget awhile the toils of day
In boundless visions of the night.

In sleep I wake, and wander o'er
By fairy streams and fountains free;
Or walk upon some bright parterre,
Enwreathed with flower, and fruit, and tree;
Or rest me in some grottoed cell,
Beside the foaming, heaving sea,
Whose floor is strewn with many a shell,
Which breathes Æolian sounds to me.

Then round me comes a fairy band,
With beauteous forms and faces bright,
To welcome to this fairy land,
And give one moment of delight
To earth-worn spirits such as mine,
Whose deadened sense and aching breast
Sweet sleep renews with healing balm,
And gives from toil and care a rest.

But lo! the enchanting scenes have fled;
Those beauteous forms have passed away;
The lark soars high above my head,
And loud proclaims the coming day.
The mists that gathered through the night
Upon the valley dark and drear,
Are rolling up the mountain's height,
And soon from sight will disappear.

The trees that crown the mountain's brow
Lift high their waving, plumelike heads,
As if to catch Sol's earliest ray,
And warn me of Time's stealthy tread—
That I should rise and sally forth,
My lifelong tasks commence anew,
Till darkness veils once more the earth,
And brings bright visions ever new.

THE RED-WHISKERED ASSASSIN.

BY GIACOMO S. CAMPANA.

"As lean as a Frenchman." And why as lean as a Frenchman, any more than as lean as a Yankee, or as lean as a Georgian? Do Frenchmen monopolize all the macritude of the world, or even any undue portion of it? No sir-ee; not at all. It is simply one of those no-such-things which John Bull has repeated so often, that he is now willing to swear to them.

By the way, to make the "entente cordiale" complete, Louis Napoleon ought to propose to her Britannic majesty the total abolition of all those old-fashioned national personalities, or personal nationalities (whichever they ought to be called), including Hogarth's "Gate of Calais."

But, on second thoughts, a thorough revolution of that sort would spoil a great deal of good fun now enjoyed by the Americans who visit Paris and London, and hear the two Johnnies, Bull and Crapaud, abuse each other; particularly on the stage. What gets the worst of the battle, in that case, is the emperor's French and the queen's English, mutually murdered by both parties. They used to have an actor at the Theatre des Palais Royal, who made his fortune by speaking English, which he used to do in this style: "Juhn! Juhn! you moost obeyee to dose ladee!" Nor is the English French much better than the French English.

But we are wandering from our subject. We were about to say that we have seen a good many millions of Frenchmen, of all sorts and sizes, and we are willing to stake our reputation upon the assertion that the people of that ingenious and enterprising nation are not a whit worse off for adipose matter than our own countrymen, if as much so. That they are a little less puffy than their neighbors over the channel, is perhaps true.

That important point being settled, we will proceed with our true history. A number of years ago there lived, in the Great Valley of Virginia, a fat Frenchman. Yes, whatever the prejudice on the subject of the race may be, no one would be hardly enough to deny that Jean Jacques Legras was a fat Frenchman—that the Frenchman, though a Frenchman, was fat, and that the fat, though undeniable fat, was French; unless, indeed, it be contended that as much of it as was the product of Virginia "hog and hominy," should be set down as American. Be that as it may, the fat itself was a veritable "fixed fact." And Legras was no small potatoes of a fat man, either. He might have passed muster as a London alderman, played Falstaff without stuffing, or stood the test of any of those ordeals which are supposed to be the touchstones of legitimate pingitude.

In body and bulk, then, it will not be denied that our Frenchman was a great man. If he was not correspondingly great in other respects, it can hardly be said to have been his fault; for Jean Jacques had the infirmity of noble minds—he was ambitious. He panted for an opportunity of distinguishing himself; he thirsted for glory, as the traveller in the desert thirsts for the crystal well in the emerald oasis. It was military glory, especially, that he longed for; and if he lived in such "piping times of peace" as to make its attainment impracticable, he surely was not to blame for it. It was only because swords were so scarce, and ploughshares so plentiful, that he had failed to become a Julius Cæsar or a Napoleon Bonaparte. Such, at least, was his opinion; and who ought to know, if he didn't?

Fate having thus made him a man of peace, in spite of himself, Jean Jacques Legras was forced to smother the martial fires within him, and to allow the luxuriance of his warlike enterprise to "run to seed." The result was the transfer to his only son and heir of all those towering hopes which had so signally come to naught in his own portly person.

This son, whose mother died while he was an infant, was named Julius Cæsar Hannibal Napoleon Legras; and as his full complement of appellations was rather inconveniently tedious, it was usually abbreviated by the father into "'Annebal Napoleon," and by the schoolboys into "Hanny Nap."

The future glory and greatness of this long-named youth was the subject of Jean Jacques's "dreams by night and visions of the day." In his own emphatic language, he was bound to make him a hero, or "bust;" and his most strenuous efforts, for many years, were almost exclusively directed to that praiseworthy object of parental ambition.

From the very cradle, Julius Cæsar Hannibal Napoleon's training was of a warlike character. No coral and bells, no harmless rattle, no peaceful playthings of any description, were ever allowed to soothe his infant poutance. His toys were all suggestive of the "pomp and pride and circumstance of glorious war;" his play-house was a military magazine in miniature; and if it had been practicable, the gallant Jean Jacques would have made his daily bread a conglomeration of "gun, drum, trumpet, blunderbuss and thunder," and his diurnal drink some terrible brewage of aquafortis and gunpowder.

As soon as the embryo hero was able to walk, he began to learn the manual exercise, and such warlike accomplishments. His progress was altogether satisfactory to the party immediately interested; but envious "outsiders" maintained that there was a fatal defect in the system, inasmuch as the father, who was his only teacher, was an arrant ignoramus, and had the misfortune not to know it. They maintained, however, that there was one consolation he might have had, if he had not been too obtuse to perceive it; and that was, that the son, being as great a numskull as the parent, would probably advance as fast under one teacher as another. What a melancholy thought it is that no position is sufficiently exalted to escape the tongue of detraction!

Jean Jacques and his neighbors both agreed in considering Julius Cæsar Hannibal Napoleon a true "chip of the old block;" but it must be confessed that there was a difference of opinion about the stuff the old block itself was made of. If you had asked one of those unmannerly outsiders to interpret the epithet, he would have told you that it meant a thorough poltroon, as well as an unmitigated ass. Like the old man, however, they would admit that he had some redeeming traits—that he was at least good-natured, and, like most cowards, anxious to please all and give offence to none.

After Hannibal Napoleon had been educated up to what his father thought the proper point, the latter resolved, if possible, to have him finished off at West Point. With this object in view, he became the bête noire, the especial aversion, of the member of Congress from his district, who soon learned to dread his approach as if he had been a locomotive amalgamation of small pox and yellow fever. He flattered, and cajoled, and blustered, and threatened—or at least made attempts at all these—by turns; but it was all of no avail. Uncle Sam would have nothing to do with Hannibal Napoleon.

Crossed in this darling purpose, Legras determined to convey the embryo hero to his father—or rather his grand-father-land. He took him to France, and actually succeeded in getting him matriculated at the Ecole Polytechnique. This was a great triumph—but alas! a short-lived one; for hardly had the proud father returned to the shores of America, when back came Hannibal Napoleon, thrown upon his hands again like a piece of damaged goods, and bringing with him a laconic epistle, which was, in substance, a Gallic version of the well-known English proverb, "There is no making a whistle out of a pig's tail"—a proverb, by the way, which some Yankee has falsified by actually constructing a very excellent whistle with no other material than one of those same scandalous appendages.

This was a cut of the unkindest kind; but Jean Jacques was not a man to let anything trouble him long. He railed bitterly against the Bourbons, whom he accused of being the cause of this mishap, in consequence of their jealousy of the young hero! They knew that he himself had been an ardent supporter of the great Napoleon, and they hated Julius Cæsar Hannibal Napoleon Legras, both from dread of what his budding abilities might produce in the future, and from their dislike to the ever-glorious name he bore. He had always been inclined to think that Louis XVIII. was envious of him and his family, and now he had a positive assurance of the fact.

The Virginia Military Institute, unfortunately, was not then in existence, or he would undoubtedly have tried that also. As it was, his ardor was somewhat abated by his successive disappointments, and he began to turn his attention to the promotion of his son's interests in another quarter. Hannibal Napoleon was now far advanced in his hobbydehoyhood, and would soon be a man, and in a condition to settle for life—which means being fastened down to one spot by that peculiar contrivance called wedlock; and absurdly so, since that is not properly a lock at all to which there can be no key. Once advantageously "settled," Hannibal Napoleon might at least stand a chance of becoming a general of militia, if nothing better offered in the meantime.

As to this settling operation, the father had always had peculiar views for his son, and he thought it was now time to develop them. His only sister had married a Virginia gentleman named Brotherton, and their daughter, and only child Ada, was now an orphan, and under his guardianship. She was an especially beautiful, amiable and intelligent girl.

An important change was now about to take place in the hitherto monotonous life of Ada Brotherton. She had been away at school ever since the death of her parents, and had consequently seen very little of her uncle and cousin. Now, however, her educational course was completed, and the beautiful girl, now just blossoming into womanhood, was to be transferred to the Legras homestead, which its proprietor had dignified with the high-sounding, historical appellation of Austerlitz.

Ada had already left school, and was spending a few weeks with one of her young friends, in the pretty village of Harrisonburg, in Rockingham county, where her father had formerly lived. Here her uncle was to meet her, and convey her in his carriage to Austerlitz.

In view of this little trip, Jean Jacques had made certain calculations which required that his son should accompany him. What their nature was, may be gathered from the following colloquy, which took place between the father and son, the day before the projected visit to Harrisonburg:

"Sit down yourself, von moment, my son; I 'ave need to 'avé wiz you von leetle tete-a-tete—von leetle vat you call consoltation. Now tell me, 'Anneebal Napoleon, vat you tink about to get marry—hein?"

"About getting married? I never thought anything at all about it. What makes you ask?"

"Baycause I tink it lofty time—"

"High time, you mean."

"Varee vell; high time, den, for you to commence for to tink 'bout him. Oui—yes, sair. And dere is von yong ladee which has beaucoup d'argent—ver mosh silver—and which is beautiful, too; beautiful comme un ange des cieux—like as von sky angel. And dis yong ladee, so beautiful, and so reesh, and so—vat you call—so accomplie—so complicate—"

"So accomplished, you mean."

"Ah, oui!—yes, so accomplished. O, que vous etes savant!—that you are learned, my son! Vell, dis yong ladee, which is likewise scholar, and grande musicienne—big musician—touches de piano, and pinches de guitar, and is tout a fait—all to fact—accomplish; how you like to husband her—to marry her—eh?"

"I wouldn't like it at all. I don't want none of your dictionary-talking gals. I'd rather have Sal Spikes, a heap."

"But dis is not von dictionnaire-talk ladee. It is your own cousine, Mees Ada Brozsairton; and she is vort feefty tousand dollair. How you like dat, sair?"

"Well, I dunno. I should like the money."

"And you not like de yong ladee too? You ought to be shame of yourself, corbleu! You not assez de Francais—you not Frenchman 'nough—you too mosh Yankee, or you would be more galant. Mille tonnerres! If I vas not her oncle, and not quite so mosh fat, I would cut you in—no, cut you out—and marry her meself, corbleu! But it vould nevair do for tant d'argent—for so mosh monëy to quit de family. You moost marry her."

"Well, father, I don't mind the marryin' and the money, but I don't know how to go about it; I don't know how to court. If it was Sal Spikes, now! But I don't hardly know my coasin; I don't know what to say."

"Vell, vell, you joost do vat I bid you. I'll tell you vat to say. But you moost be ver quick 'bout it; for Ada vill soon 'ave plenty yong fellows to court her. He bien! now you 'tend to vat I say. I am going to go to fetch her 'ome to-morrow, and you moost go 'long. I vill drive de carrosse, de carriage, my own self, and I vill say to Ada dat von of de horses is—is—vat you call—boiteux—limpy—"

"Lame?"

"Yes, yes; lame. And ven ve come to de colline rouge—de "red hill"—dis side of Harrisonboorg, I vill say you two yong peoples vas be necessair to descend and walk up de hill. So den, I vill drive on, outside of sight. And ven you comes to un endroit, a spot favorable, you moost put your knees on dair you, bend yourself, and say: 'Ange de mon cœur—angel of my 'eart, deign to cast von pitying glance upon de slave at your feet, and allow dose 'eavenly eyes to cure de evils dey have inflic' 'pon de mos' humble of your admirers, Julius Cæsar 'Anneehal Napoleon Legras.' Vat you tink of dat, eh? She not stand dat, my boy; not nevair. She vill raise you from your knee, and den you moost, vat you call, hop de question, sur le champ—on de field—right off de spinnin'-veel."

"Right off the reel, you mean."

"Vell, vell; all same von as tudder. You try dat plan, and see if it don't labor—"

"Work, you mean, father."

"Ah, vell! vork is labor, and labor is vork; and if dat plan don't vork, den call me a rigmorumus. Ve moost 'ave von—von—von pud-ding—"

"Wedding, I s'pose you mean?"

"Ah, oui, yes! ve vill have von wedding nex Christmas; and ve vill do it en grand—do it big. And ve vill drink de healt' of de great Napoleon, and all de leetle Napoleons, too. Joost you do vat I tell you, and dere vill not be no trooble 'bout Ada's consent to de fiancailles—to de hop de question—"

"Pop the question—not hop."

"Vell, vell; pop, den, let it be. And be sure you pop it vell, and don't make no meeetake."

With this parting injunction, the council was dissolved, and both parties proceeded to make preparations for the important expedition. Hannibal Napoleon was rigged out for the occasion in a style which, in cockney phrase of the present day, would be called stunning—and a stunning result was anticipated, both by himself and his admiring parent. It so happened that the young man, so far as figure was concerned, was the very antipodes of the old one. He was long, lean, lathy and limber, and, in the highest degree, awkward and ungainly. Jean Jacques, however, believed his person to be the very pink of perfection, and lauded to the skies his "slim and genteel" corporality, in his own peculiar fashion—managing, generally, to top off with an expressive anti-climax.

"Ah, mon fils—ah, my son," said he, when he saw him adorned for the ride, "dat is grand, splendeed, magnificent, exquisiteet, sooblime, pretty good!"

The day was a beautiful one, all things went well, and the party left Harrisonburg in high feather. When they reached the "Red Hill" the old man sprang his mine.

"Ma chere Ada—my dear child, dis old horse on dat side have somehow estropiated—lamed—hissself. Now if you two yong peoples vill git out and valk yourselves ovair dis big hill, me and de horse vill be ver mosh obligate for de kindness."

Anxious to please her uncle, Ada leaped from the carriage immediately. Hannibal Napoleon followed, at a much more deliberate pace, and then the old man drove on.

It was a delicious summer evening, and our friends had suffered themselves to be delayed till it was quite late. There was a full moon in prospect, however, and they did not think it necessary to be in a hurry. As we have already stated, Hannibal Napoleon's knowledge of his cousin was but slight, and his acquaintance with ladies in general was limited to Sal Spikes and "a few more of the same sort."

He was now alone with his cousin for the first time, and the important moment had arrived when, in obedience to his father's directions, he was to secure his pretty cousin and ever so many thousands of dollars. The two pedestrians were about as totally unlike as two human beings well could be. Ada was a refined and intelligent young lady, with a soul attuned to all the harmonies of nature; Hannibal Napoleon was—the reader knows what.

The young gentleman had a dim consciousness that it would not do to "hop the question" abruptly, without anything in the way of preliminaries. He therefore began to cudgel his brain, in order to find a remark to begin with; but Hannibal Napoleon's brain was a stubborn one, and not much in the habit of standing by its owner in such emergencies. He looked up to the sky, and he looked down to the ground, and he looked all around him—but nothing came of it. O, for an idea! thought he; but not as idea came to his assistance. They were a sort of thing whose acquaintance he had little cultivated, and they now stood aloof, in the hour of his sorest need and bitterest tribulation.

Suddenly a hungry-looking porker sprang out of a clump of bushes, and with a loud grunt, ran across the road. No bigoted Israelite ever cursed the whole porcine race more emphatically than Hannibal Napoleon blessed it now. It was a perfect godsend.

"I say, Cousin Ada, don't it make your mouth water to think about hog-killin' time?"

"Why, cousin?"

"O, sasages, you know, and spar'riba, and chimes, and cracklin'-pone, and them—splendid!"

The subject was a fortunate one. Those who feel deeply, they say, speak eloquently. If so, no one could have the elements of eloquence in greater perfection than this enthusiastic youth. It was a congenial topic, for if there was anything on earth he loved, it was the rich unctuous morsels which he had in his mind's eye then—

"Grease that was living grease no more,"

as Byron (might have) said.

But the young man's organ of language was not a prominent one, and even grease soon failed him; and a long silence followed. At last, happening to look into a cornfield by the roadside, he caught another idea, and pressed it into use.

"I say, Cousin Ada, do you like roasting-ears best when they're roasted or when they're biled?"

Ada had not paid much attention to the subject, and distrusted her ability to offer an intelligent opinion—hardly knew which she liked best. Her companion gave her the benefit of his experience; but it did not last long, and the conversation again languished.

They had now reached the top of the hill. Hannibal Napoleon was again at a loss for an idea, and knew not where to look for one. Fortunately, he happened to cast his eyes towards the setting sun. Ada followed their direction, and at once became absorbed in contemplating the glories of the scene.

The spot is a commanding one. To the eastward you have the Massanutten mountain, running boldly off towards the south, and then terminating as suddenly as if it had been swallowed up by an earthquake; and beyond it the Blue Ridge, extending, both to the right and left, as far as the eye can reach. Far westward the view is terminated by the North Mountain, and between it and the spectator lies a beautiful rolling country, smiling in the lap of peace and plenty, and rich in all the elements of rural beauty.

Below the feet of the beholder lies the village of Harrisonburg, with all the adjuncts of an American country-seat of the better class. Immediately in front is the court-house, with its steeple crowned by an ichthyological vane, which tells you faithfully how the last strong wind blew; and, a little to the right, a church with its steeple surmounted by a trumpet that will neither blow itself, nor tell how the wind blows, though it professes to be a vane also. And further in the distance are various other churches, and numerous private residences, some of them of a pleasing, tasteful exterior.

Such is Harrisonburg at the present day, and the more prominent features of the scene were not materially different from this at the period of which we write. The cousins saw them gilded and adorned by all the beauties of a most gorgeous Virginia sunset—

"Not as in Northern climes, obscurely bright,
But one unclouded blaze of living light."

If by "unclouded," Byron here means that the whole heavens were free from clouds, we humbly submit that he has spoiled his sunset. This beautiful phenomenon, even in Greece, could never be exhibited in full perfection unless there were masses of vapor collected above the departing luminary. Such was the case in the glorious scene upon which Ada was gazing with all her soul in her eyes.

Pile on pile, in a vast arch spanning the whole western heavens, lay huge masses of clouds, which one who saw them for the first time might well mistake for entire mountains, composed, each one, of a single gem. Mighty masses of ruby reposed on pillars of jasper; lofty pinnacles of purest gold towered up to heaven, with a background of ultramarine or azure; vast piles of amethyst, and topaz, and sapphire, and cornelian, were glowing as with ten thousand beacon-fires; while opalescent tints and ever-varying hues played over the whole, till all at last seemed to melt into "one entire and perfect chrysolite," extending from the zenith to the horizon, and then gradually fading away into the sober russet of the sunless twilight sky.

But it is time that we should return to earth, and to Hannibal-Napoleon, whom we have left all this time gaping after an idea. He was so still, that his cousin supposed him to be, like herself, absorbed in the contemplation of the glorious scene before them. And so he was, and he proved it, the next minute, by exclaiming:

"I say, cousin, do you know what that thar looks like? It looks jest like the inside of Aunt Betty's copper kettle, with streaks of apple-butter smeared all over it—it does, by gum!"

To this elegant comparison, Ada had nothing to say, and the two walked slowly forward. Presently Hannibal Napoleon wheeled off to one side of the road, and beckoned to Ada to follow him. When she did so, he suddenly dropped on one knee, threw himself into an attitude which he considered very graceful, rolled up his eyes with a die-away expression, and then, with a sudden start and a ludicrous grimace, cried:

"Consarn them chesnut-burs!"

That was not exactly what Ada had expected to hear—though the fact is, she did not know what to expect. At first, she was inclined to think him not right in his mind; then she imagined he was going to say his prayers; and then she didn't know what to think, but stuffed her handkerchief into her mouth, to stifle a laugh, and awaited the denouement.

Hannibal Napoleon shifted his legs, threw back his head, rolled up his eyes again, opened his mouth, and—r-r-r-p! something suddenly gave way at the nether end of his continuations. Casting a rueful glance below, he exclaimed:

"Od rot them straps!"

Ada was thoroughly mystified, and at the same time so excessively amused, as to make an explosion of laughter very difficult to suppress. For this reason, she began slowly to walk forward, but had only taken a few steps, when her genuflecting cousin called out:

"Cousin Ada! ho, Cousin Ada! Come back here! I've got something to say to you."

She returned. Hannibal Napoleon again struck an attitude, threw back his head, opened his mouth, and said:

"Cuss that hat—it wont stay on!"

His hat had fallen off. The same thing had happened twice before, and the lover was at his wit's ends, for his new beaver was the darling of his heart, and the earth was a mass of mud.

At last his face brightened. A happy thought had struck him.

"Here, cousin," said he, "just hold that hat a minute or two—will you?"

Ada consented. The graceful position was resumed, and at last the question-popping commenced. In the tone of a school-boy reciting his task, and with an exact repetition of the ridiculous, lackadaisical gestures used by his father, he commenced:

"Angel of my heart, deign to cast a pitying glance upon the slave at your feet, and allow those heavenly eyes to—to—to cure—those heavenly eyes to—to—to cure—to cure the measles—"

Ada's pent-up risibilities could endure no longer. A clear, loud, ringing, musical laugh burst forth, and her whole frame was convulsed by the explosion, repeated as it was every time she looked at her cousin, who remained still in the same silly posture, with a look upon his face which could only be characterized by borrowing a word from his grandmother tongue—ebahi. Though exceedingly amazed that his companion should laugh at so serious a matter, he was not at all embarrassed.

"Cuss the thing—I have forgot it! But you just hold on a minute, and—stop! I've got it! cure the evils—that's it! I knowed I could come it—cure the evils—"

And he was about to finish the high-flown harangue which his father had provided for him, when an unexpected interruption occurred in the shape of the report of a gun or pistol, followed by a long, loud, shrill cry, or rather yell, coming apparently from the carriage, which by this time was some distance ahead.

"That's father's voice!" cried Hannibal Napoleon, starting to his feet, and as pale as a corpse.

Without a moment's hesitation, Ada began to run towards her uncle; and her cousin, we are sorry to say, began to travel, at a 2.40 speed, in precisely the opposite direction. The reader will not be surprised, therefore, to learn that the young lady was the first to reach the carriage. When she reached it, she found the horses hitched to a tree, and no one to be seen anywhere. In a moment, however, she heard a dismal groan from the carriage.

"Is that you, uncle?" she asked.

There was no reply, but a repetition of the groan.

After a little hesitation, she climbed into the vehicle, and found her uncle stretched at full length upon the cushions. For some time she received no reply to her repeated questions, save an additional groan, and a piteous cry for mercy. At last, however, the old man said, feebly and tremulously:

"Est-ce toi, ma chère—is it you, my dear?"

"Yes, dear uncle, it is I. What is the matter?"

"Ah, ma chère niece, it is all ovaire vid me—c'est fait de moi—I am done for—almos' gone."

"You are not hurt—are you, uncle?"

"I am kill, my dear—shot to deat'."

"Where are you hurt? I don't see any blood."

"It is not blood, my shild; it is brains. Here, you can feel dem all ovaire my face. De ball split my head open, and scatter dem everywhere."

"Why, uncle, that's not brains! That is the Dutch cheese you had in your hat. Smell it!"

"Tonnere de Dieu! I do b'lieve it is sheese, af-tair all. You no feel no hole in my 'ead?"

"No, indeed. You are not hurt at all."

"Dat is ver strange. I feel de bullet strike me joost here. Juste ciel! vat a tick skull I must 'ave."

"But who was it, uncle? How did it happen?"

"Vy, it 'appen dat I vas drive along, not tink-ing of noting, and mos' asleep, ven all at vonce de horses vas stop, and I saw stand bayfore me von great, big, tall sacr-r-r-r-r-r-e villain ras-cal, vid big red veeskair, and a black patch in von eye, and he not say noting, but poot von pistol to my 'ead, and bang! he shoot me right here in de temple, and I joost 'ave de time to give von screech, and den I fall ovaire, and not know noting no more till I hear you call me. But vere is my son—vere is 'Annebal Napoleon?"

Ada made an ambiguous answer, for she did not like to tell the old man that his darling son had run away, instead of coming to his assistance. The father was easily satisfied.

"Vell, vell," said he, "I sooppose he must 'ave see de vilain ras-cal, vid de big red veeskair and de black patch on von eye; he must 'ave runned aftair him, to catch him. Dat boy is so courageux—so full of fight—I 'ave great fear of his get into some difficult. Look, my dear shild, and see if you can apperceive someting of him, someveres."

Ada did as she was bid, and presently saw the hopeful youth peeping cautiously over a fence. Hearing no further alarm, he had turned about and crept slowly up to the carriage, keeping the fence between him and the road. Seeing that all was right, he now showed himself, and advanced towards the others.

"Did you catch him, my son?" asked the father.

"Catch who?"

"Dat great, tall, sacrr-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid big red veeskair, and black patch on von eye."

"I didn't see nobody with no big red whiskers, nor black patch on their eye."

Fearing an unpleasant explanation, and observing that several persons were approaching, attracted no doubt by the old gentleman's yell, Ada good-naturedly diverted her uncle's attention, and suggested the propriety of unhitching the horse and proceeding at once. This was done, and the old man drove rapidly homeward, imagining that he saw, behind every bush, and in every fence-corner, "dat great, tall, sacrr-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid de big red veeskair, and de black patch on von eye."

They reached home in safety, and nothing of importance occurred for a week or ten days. The morning after their arrival, Jean Jacques took an opportunity to say to his niece:

"Vat vas you two yong peoples talk about las' evening, ven you valk yourselves along de overtop of de red hill, at Harrisonboorg?"

"Well, uncle, my cousin asked me if it didn't make my mouth water to think about hog-killing time, which question being appropriately answered, he then proceeded to compare the beautiful sunset sky to a copper kettle smeared with apple-butter. Those, I believe, were the most important topics of conversation."

The old man did not pursue his inquiries any further. He constantly urged his son, however, to, proceed with his suit, and the latter did make certain demonstrations of that sort; but Ada always laughed so consumedly, that he could never get matters brought to a crisis.

One evening the family was alarmed by a loud report, and a few minutes afterward the old gentleman rushed into the house and fell upon a sofa, half dead with fright and the speed with which he had been running. When he had in some degree recovered his breath, he felt himself carefully all over, and then said:

"Dieu merci! I tink he not hit me dis time; I don't feel no hole novheres."

"Whom do you mean, uncle?"

"I mean dat enfant du diable—dat debil's baby—dat sacrr-r-r-e, big, tall, vilain ras-cal, vid de big red veeskair, and de black patch on von eye! He vas sit up in de top of de big apple-tree, by de stable-door, a-vaitin' for me to come to de stable; but I saw de scoundrel in time, and j'ai fait mon possible—I do my possible to get behind de meat-ouse bayfore he shoot, and I joost save my cochon—my bacon. I hear de bullet whiz past mon oreille gauche—my awkward ear."

"Your left ear, uncle."

"Vell, vell, it is all same in French. But dis is get to be terreeble. I shall not 'ave no peace, not nevair no more, for dat sacrr-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid de big red veeskair, and de black patch on von eye. Vat he shoot me for? I do him noting—que le diable l'emporte!—devil fly away vid him!"

Monsieur Legras went about his daily avocations with fear and trembling. He became excessively nervous, and heard the report of a pistol in every slamming door. He even began to lose his appetite and grow thin. He believed there was some terrible mystery about the red-whiskered assassin, for all his inquiries in relation to him were fruitless. Nobody else had ever seen him, and some went so far as to believe him a myth, a creature of the Frenchman's imagination.

In the meantime, Hannibal Napoleon's courtship was making very little progress; and this was another source of annoyance to the old gentleman. He was quite out of patience with the young man's dilatoriness, and had once said to him, with great emphasis: "'Anneebal Napoleon, you are von son of a jackass."

One evening the Legras household was waiting impatiently for the evening meal. The head of the family was absent—a very unusual thing at this hour. He had gone out to see about the cutting down of some trees for timber, but was to have been back before sunset, and the candles had now been lit for some time.

At last he made his appearance, leaning on the arm of a young gentleman who was not a resident of the neighborhood, though he had been several times a visitor at Austerlitz. He was a rising young lawyer, named Medwynne. Mr. Legras greatly needed his support, for he seemed hardly able to walk.

"Dear uncle, what is the matter?" asked Ada.

"Ah, ma chere niece—my dear shild! I give it up. C'est fait de moi! I am done for—use up! I can stan' it no longer."

"Stand what, uncle?"

"Vy, dat abomeeneable, miserable, dirty, mean, low, vile, disgracefool, ugly, beastly, cowardly, hatefool, daytestable, infernal, sac-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid big red veeskair and black patch on von eye!"

"What has he done now, uncle?"

"Vat has he not done? He 'ave tree time shoot me to de door of de grave, and dis time he vas run up to finish his work, ven dis excellent yong gentleman 'appen to come up, and scare him away, or you would have 'ad no oncle by dis time, my shild. Scelerat! Que le diable t'etouffe!"

"Well, well, uncle, we will help you up to bed, and after you have lain down I will bring you a cup of tea and something to eat."

The old gentleman was supported to his bed by Ada and the young lawyer. There was a curious intermingling of fingers, in the course of this operation, and any one who had been looking sharply might have seen Ada slip a note into her bosom. But that is no business of ours.

Before ten o'clock, the Legras establishment was, to all appearance, buried in slumber. The only watcher about the house was the young gentleman-guest, Mr. Medwynne, who was seated by a candle, with a number of the Rockingham Register in his hand.

Suddenly a noise in the upper part of the house broke the stillness of the night; then came a strange shuffling sound upon the stairs, and then Monsieur Legras, in nocturnal attire, and pale as the intruder in King Priam's bed-chamber, burst into the room. He was in a half fainting condition, and would have fallen upon the floor, if Mr. Medwynne had not prevented it and supported him to a seat. He was all the time struggling to speak, and as soon as he could get the words out, he exclaimed:

"Mon cher ami—my dear friend—I call on you to bear witness dat I 'ave not no wish for to marry togezair my son and my niece Ada. I give my pairfect consent for her to marry vatevair she please, wherevair she please, howevair she please, howevair anybody else please, and how everybody please. Je m'en lave les mains—I wash my 'ands of it, and I vill not 'ave noting to do vid it—au grand jamais—not nevair no more forevair and evairlasting."

"Why, Mr. Legras, what is the matter now?"

"De mattair? De mattair now is same as alway. De mattair—grand Dieu!—de mattair is dat enfant du diable—dat spawn of de devil—dat infairnal, great, tall, sac-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid de big red veeskair and de black patch on von eye!"

"It is not possible that he has had the impudence to come into the house?"

"It is posseeble for him to 'ave de impudence of de devil hisself. He come into de house, and into my shambair, and close to de side of my bed, and ven I open my eyes, I see him in de moonlight stand ovaire me, by de side of de table where I 'ad my sooppair. And vidout to say not von single vord, he trow down on de table von leetle bit pocket-pistol; and den he trow down von leetle biggair pistol; and den he trow von great aynormous big 'orse-pistol; and den von leetle gun; and den von mosh biggair gun; and den von traymendous big blunderbush, all same as von leetle cannon; and den von leetle daggair; and den von big daggair; and den von leetle knife; and den von big knife; and den von leetle small-sword; and den von big broad-sword; and den von big bludgeon-stick; and den von bottle of pison; and, las' of all, von haltair—von gallows-rope. After dat, he pick up de tings, von after tudder, and he say:

"If you dare for to praysume for to marry your niece to dat stupeed ass of a son of yours, I vill shoot you vid dis, and dis, and dis (de pistols), and dis, and dis, and dis (de guns); and I vill stab you vid dis, and dis (de daggairs); and I vill cut your heart out vid dis, and dis (de knives); and I vill stick you trough vid dis, and cut and slash you vid dis (de swards); and I vill knock you brains out vid dis (de bludgeon-stick); and I vill make you swallow down dis (de pisen); and den I vill hang you up vid dis (de gallows-rope), till you are as dry as gunpowder and as brittle as glass; and den I vill take von mortar and pestle and pulverize you into atoms, and scattair you into de immensity of space, where noting but Omniscience vill ever be able to find you, and noting but Omnipotence to put you togezair again!"

"And he shake his sledge-hammair fist in de face of me, and I shut my eyes tight, and ven I open dem vonce more, I not see noting more of dat sac-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid big red veeskair and black patch on von eye!"

"O, Mr. Medwynne," continued the be-devilled old Frenchman, "vat shall I do about it? 'Anneebal Napoleon vill nevair consent to give her up—no, not nevair, no—"

His words were arrested by another noise upon the staircase, a tremendous racket, followed by a sort of bumpety-bump, bumpety-bump, bumpety-bum, bum, bum! caused, evidently, by some heavy body tumbling down the stairs.

The younger gentleman ran to the door, and opening it, found Hannibal Napoleon at the bottom of the steps struggling to get on his legs again, and rubbing his empty pate, which had received some pretty hard knocks in his head—long descent from the landing-place above. His face would have made a capital study for a "knight of the rueful countenance," and the tears were actually starting from his eyes. Some overmastering excitement, however, appeared to possess him, for he instantly burst forth, with excessive volubility (half crying all the time), into the following speech:

"I don't want to marry my cousin! I never did want to marry my cousin! Anybody what says so is a liar! It was all father's doin's! I never courted her! It's all a confounded lie, so it is! Boo hoo, hoo, hoo!"

And here the young hero's feelings so entirely got the better of him, that he began to cry, like a full-grown baby. Suddenly an idea seemed to strike him, and he turned to Mr. Medwynne and sobbed out:

"Wont you marry her, Mr. Medwynne? I do wish somebody would marry her!"

"Tell us first what it is that has discomposed you so? What has happened to you?"

"Why, jest now, when I was fast asleep and dreamin' about somebody a-robbin' my water-millon-patch, I waked up all of a sudden and saw a great, big, ugly-looking feller standin' close beside the bed."

"Hadt' he von red head?" asked the old man.

"Yes."

"And a big red veeskair?"

"Yes."

"And a black patch on von eye?"

"Yes."

"I tought so—tonners de Dieu!—I tought so! Dat same sac-r-r-r-e vilain ras-cal!" the old man exclaimed, in trepidation.

"Well, he showed me a whole passel o' guns, and pistols, and knives, and clubs, and pison-bottles, and ropes, and things, and he swore how that ef I dared even to think of sich a thing as marryin' my Cousin Ada, he'd shoot me, and stab me, and knock my brains out, and pison me, and hang me, and grind me up in a mortar and pesle, and scatter me into the intensity of space, when the Venetians would not be able to find me, nor their impotence to put me together again! And then he stept out o' the moonlight, I don't know where; and I jumped out o' bed, and run down here. O, me! What shall I do! Boo, hoo, hoo, hoo! For the Lord's sake, Mr. Medwynne, do marry her—wont you? But 'taint no use, though. Father never will consent to it!"

"Vont I, dough? Joost try me a leet!"

"You'll be willin' for Mr. Medwynne to marry Ada, and for me not to?"

"I will dat—and no meestake!"

"Why, father—what is the matter with you?"

"Vhy, son—what is de mattair of you? Tell me dat, and I tell you dis. I tink me bote mattair joost about the same von as tudder. Mees-tair Medwynne 'ave my fool consent for to marry my niece as mosh as evair he please. De bet-tair de soonair."

"And wont you do it, Mr. Medwynne? Do have her, now; wont you? she's a mighty nice gal—indeed she is."

"Well, if it will really be an accommodation to you, I don't much care if I do."

"Huzzar! Sic semper tyrannis—e pluribus unum! Cock-a-doodle-doo-oo! Hooray!"

The reader will not require to be told that this was not the first time that Mr. Medwynne had thoughts of such a thing. Neither will he require from us a minute statement of the plot against Monsieur Legras, and how it was conducted. The following extract from a letter subsequently received by Miss Ada from Mr. Medwynne, will probably suffice.

"Yes, dearest Ada, it was necessary to deceive your uncle, and to treat him with apparent roughness; though you must allow that we have been careful to do no real injury either to him or your cousin. Nor would it have answered to have let you into the secret. Your soft heartedness would very soon have spoiled our plot. His own fears met us half way, and rendered our task a very easy one. I didn't disguise myself, nor indeed had I anything to do, except the last time, when I shoved him over into a ditch, at the instant that John Eldon blazed away. He had been talking with a neighbor, and had forgotten it was so late. The first time, in the carriage, John leaned over, himself, and knocked down his hat, cheese and all, over his eyes, with his left hand, while he pulled the trigger of the pistol with his right. There is not a milder looking man anywhere than John Eldon, but he certainly does look frightful in his assassin costume. I mean to exhibit him to you, in full fig; when you cross my threshold, dearest Ada, the first thing you see will be the 'great big, tall, sac-r-r-r-e vilain ras-cal, vid big red veeskair, and black patch on von eye!"

THE REMEMBRANCE.

Methought I stood in realms beyond the grave,
Where, in a waste and melancholy place,
I saw my mother—the same pensive grace
Hung round her forehead, but upon her cheek
Tears, as if shed by one who strove to save
The thing it loved from ill, though all too weak.
I looked again into those anxious eyes,
And read the same veiled tenderness; her breast
Sighed, as if filled with earthly memories.
I gazed on that loved face, and gazing blessed,
Until my eyes o'erflowed; but in those tears
I felt joy inexpressible—for they
While flowing brought me back to boyhood's years—
Waters that washed my human sins away!—REDA.

THE BLIND GIRL OF WATERLOO.

BY FRANKLIN J. FOX.

THE little Belgic hamlet of Waterloo, although otherwise entirely insignificant and uninteresting, lying some miles southerly from Brussels, was, as my reader need not be informed, some fifty years since, the locality of one of the most important and desperately contested battles of modern times. The spot is now classic ground; and no one, I am sure, for whom the romantic career of Napoleon has ever possessed half the interest and fascination which the perusal of its record usually excites, can linger among the shattered walks of Hougoumont or La Haye Sainte, or survey the field from the heights of La Belle Alliance, where the emperor staked and lost throne, liberty and power, without becoming deeply absorbed in the reflections so naturally suggested by the scene. At harvest time, a rank growth of grain thickly covers the ridges and intervalles, which, as the guides tell you, grows to rust and decay before it ripens; and where the grain is the richest, you can easily mark the spots where the carnage was most bloody. So strange did it seem, that the best blood of Europe should be given to enrich, and to no purpose, the fields of Waterloo!

And doubly strange did it seem, to reflect, as I did while wandering amid these relics of man's violence, that a spectacle so awful, so tragic, as that which the eighteenth day of June, 1815, here witnessed, should have been displayed upon the Sabbath; that of all other days, that should have been consecrated to this fearful work, which a merciful Creator set apart for rest and worship. That while the parents, the brothers and sisters, and the wives of those who here met in the struggle of death, were sending up their prayers to Heaven, in the humble chapel or lofty cathedral, those for whom they supplicated, were, it may be at that selfsame moment engaged in the work of slaughter, or were themselves gasping in the agonies of death upon the field of "red Waterloo!"

And yet, much as reflections like these affected me—solemn as was the thought, that here hundreds of the bravest hearts of France and England were forever stilled, leaving in their distant homes mourners for life—I must confess that nothing which I here saw or felt, interested or affected me half so deeply as a simple story I heard the same evening, upon my return from the battle-field to the hamlet.

As we passed through the little street of the latter, my attention was attracted by a group, a family, as I judged, sitting in front of one of the numberless shops where mementoes of the place are sold. There was, first, a female, a young girl, whose face, save a strange vacancy and dreaminess in its expression, impressed me as being extremely lovely. Further examination, however, made me aware of the fact that she was entirely blind. A little child, evidently her own, to judge from the marked resemblance between them, stood by her side; while close at hand, watching every slight movement, each expression of her face, was an athletic, handsome man, whose intelligent countenance was extremely grave and careworn. Aside from the interesting study afforded by the sad yet patient face of the blind girl, the conduct of this man particularly drew my attention. The contemplation of his companion seemed to engross all his faculties; he was so absorbed in watching her, as to be almost unconscious of the presence of aught else; or if his eyes were casually turned to some other object, it was but for an instant—they were immediately directed again to her face.

"Pierre," she murmured softly, while we still stood by—"Pierre, my husband, where are you?"

"Here, darling," the man quickly replied, and his hand was placed in her lap, so that she could clasp it in both of hers. "What do you wish, Ninette; tell me, that I may gratify you."

"Mother is crying," the little child artlessly lisped, striving to clamber upon her father's knee. "Speak to her, papa, bid her not to cry! She does so often when she is alone, until she makes me cry with her. Why does she do so?"

I drew nearer, for I saw that my intrusion was not observed, and the scene was one which irresistibly laid hold upon my feelings. I could see that the man struggled to maintain his composure; yet his lip would tremble as he heard the prattling of the child, which explained its meaning, even to me. The sightless eyes of the blind girl had welled over with tears at the voice of her husband, and she now hid her face upon his shoulder. Tenderly placing his arm about her, he asked, if possible, more anxiously than before:

"Will you not tell me your wishes, Ninette? Bid me do anything for you that man can do, and it shall not be wanting." At that instant the bell of the little chapel close by commenced to toll.

"I have never had but one wish," was the hardly audible reply, as the speaker slightly raised her head; "and that, alas! is impossible to be fulfilled. Hark—that is the vesper bell, and the sun must now be setting! Ah, Pierre, these are four dreary years which have passed since I last saw the sun! And I shall never more see him; no, nor the bright sky, nor the flowers; and this dear child, which I have never seen, and never can! Ah, Pierre, Pierre, it is dark, so dark!"

Her tears flowed afresh, with the words, and again she hid her face upon the shoulder of her husband. So affecting, indeed, was her grief, so touching the plaintive and inexpressibly sweet tones of her voice, and so powerful the appeal mutely given by those eyes, forever darkened to the light, that I turned away my head, to hide from the guide the emotion which I was half-ashamed to confess. Yet I need not have feared, although I doubt not that the honest fellow had witnessed this same scene, or similar ones, perhaps twenty different times, still, upon this occasion, he showed every sign of being deeply moved. Nor do I envy his humanity, who could have stood by, at that time and place, with dry eyes and composed face, unaffected and unmoved.

Upon different occasions, I have seen men powerfully touched by compassion, sympathy and grief, and have witnessed memorable displays of manly emotion; but never to such an extent as at the time of which I speak, and in the person of the blind girl's husband. As he heard her last word, great sobs of agony broke from his lips, his stout frame quivered like an aspen-leaf, and the tears coursed rapidly down his bearded cheeks. For the last few moments, devout worshippers had been hurrying past upon their way to the chapel, to attend the vesper service; and now one of the solemn, majestic chants of the Romish ritual floated out upon the still air, and distinctly reached our ears. At the sound, the husband fell upon his knees at the feet of Ninette, and seizing her hands, he turned his eyes upward, and fervently uttered the words:

"Ave Maria, purge my soul from this great wickedness! Merciful Father, forgive the sin—sweet Jesus, intercede for me!"

Unwilling to remain longer, where my presence might possibly disturb the deep solemnity of this touching scene, I walked slowly on. Looking back upon reaching a corner, I saw that Pierre was still upon his knees by the side of his wife; but her hands now rested softly upon his head, and she was inclining towards him, as if whispering some words in his ear.

I subsequently solicited from my guide a rehearsal of the story which I knew must be connected with the blindness of Ninette, and her union with Pierre; and received the following particulars, the narrator assuring me that he was perfectly conversant with them.

Four years previous to this time, Ninette, then a gay and beautiful girl of fifteen, lived with her widowed mother, since dead, in the hamlet of Waterloo. The grandfather of the young girl had been a French officer, and shared the fate of many of his companions in arms, falling in the last stand of the Old Guard; and the two, Ninette and her mother, were supported in part by a pension from the French government, and partly by the small revenue derived from the sale of relics of the place.

As might be expected, the loveliness of Ninette made her at once the envy of all the other village maidens, and the prize which each of the youth bent his energies to secure. She seemed the only object of rivalry; other fair maidens there undoubtedly were, but none so graceful or so winning as Ninette. At the same time, she appeared as if perfectly careless as to which of her admirers was most favored. Upon one day, one might flatter himself that the success of his suit was beyond peradventure; upon the day following, he was dismayed to find that his advances were most coolly and distantly received; and in this manner, each of the suitors—and there were at least a dozen—was alternately treated to smiles and frowns, raised to the summit of his hopes, and then rudely cast down to despair, until all became dejected with melancholy.

It cannot, therefore, be concealed, that Ninette was a most consummate coquette. To be, while so young, the sole object of such unbounded admiration—to have the disposal, as it were, of so many hearts, was too great a temptation to vain and trifling coquetry. Being well-disposed towards all her lovers, but regarding one hardly above another, with a thoughtlessness which had no feelings of love to check it, she exulted in her power over her victims, winning their hearts successively, only to cast them aside for new triumphs. And all this, without either artfulness or malice—for she was of too simple a mind for either; but because it pleased her girlish fancy to prolong her mastery.

But this mastery could not be forever maintained. The jealousy of the lovers had heretofore prevented their individual knowledge of the treatment which each had respectively received at the hands of the cruel Ninette; and it was only with the shame and anger aroused by the discovery, as it slowly dawned upon their deluded minds, that each was equally favored, and that all had been ruinously deceived, that they unanimously resolved to throw aside, for the while, their jealous rivalry, and mutually concert a scheme which should make Ninette the bride of one of them—which one, it was uncertain—but all agreed to join in the plot, and abide by the event. The matter was undertaken without anger, and without the slightest intention of harm to the unsuspecting girl; but rather as a peremptory measure to finally settle her preference, and to do away with the uneasiness which had long tortured them; although it is more than possible that more than one of the youths secretly regarded the mental sufferings which were being prepared for Ninette, as a measure of retribution. Happily for the plotters, none of them anticipated the disastrous results which were destined to flow from their thoughtlessness.

As Ninette was lightly tripping home one evening, without the slightest intimation of danger, she was suddenly seized and hurried into a covered vehicle, close by. Her cries were muffled in a cloak, and her person closely confined in the arms of her captor. Overcome by the violence, and terrified by dreadful apprehensions of her fate, she fainted, and remained some time in a state of utter insensibility. When she at last regained her consciousness, it was to find herself in a damp, dark room, surrounded by stone walls, dripping with moisture.* The apartment was evidently subterranean. She was lying upon the cold floor, while a tall figure, disguised from head to foot, stood beside her. Throwing herself at his feet, she piteously implored to be released and conveyed to her friends, but was rudely repulsed.

"These are the consequences of heartless coquetry," the disguised man sternly said. "And here, Ninette, shall you lie—ay, if it be even to the day of your death—until you consent to accept the hand of one of those whom your heartless conduct has well-nigh driven frantic. I shall return in an hour, to receive your decision; and remember that this is to be your dungeon, with neither food, drink nor company, until your choice is made."

"Pierre, O Pierre, pity me—release me!" the unhappy girl cried, as, recognizing the voice, she threw herself again at his feet. But the prison door was harshly closed between them, and she found herself alone. The terrors of her situation were too much for her meek spirit, again she lapsed into a swoon, and this time so deep, so deathlike, that her breathing could hardly be perceived. Her jailor returned at the expiration of the hour, and so alarmed did her situation make him, that he caused her to be conveyed instantly to her home. The same night, all of her abductors precipitately left the village, to await the event of her illness.

For weeks poor Ninette suffered in the insensibility of a burning fever, imagining herself still in the power of her cruel captors, and distressing the ears of her friends with her ravings. She recovered at last, and regained her strength; but it was only with the total loss of her sight—the blasting heat of the fever had forever closed her bright eyes to the light!

This intelligence was received with such distress of mind as may be imagined by the exiled youth; and fearing to return to incur punishment at the hands of the authorities, they became miserable wanderers over the continent. Most restless of all, a demon of unhappiness seemed to possess the wretched Pierre. He reproached himself a thousand times with the guilt of the whole transaction, since he had been the ringleader in the plot; and for several months he roamed restlessly about, "seeking peace, but finding it not." Grown desperate, at last, he determined to return to the village. He found Ninette sad and desponding under her heavy affliction, and most earnestly did he implore her forgiveness, which the gentle girl did not withhold. Nor was this all; with a heroism which did honor to his noble heart, Pierre besought her to become his wife; pleading with her to permit him to atone with the devotion of his whole life for his wrong, and assuring her, when she sadly shook her head, that he had never loved her so well as now. Ninette hesitated long, but his fidelity for several months conquered her consent. And never, since the hour of their marriage, had Pierre failed in his unwearied assiduity to anticipate her every wish. The birth of a child served to strengthen if possible this fidelity; and it was indeed beautiful and touching to see this strong man thus nobly employing his days, striving to redeem his one error. One by one, too, the erring lovers of Ninette returned to their homes, being bidden by the husband to come without fear; and the forgiveness of the wife was freely extended to them.

The renewed interest which this story, with its simple brevity, excited in its characters, drew me the next day, to the little shop of Pierre, where I purchased, from the hands of Ninette herself, several relics of the field. I have carefully cherished and preserved them, not so much as souvenirs of the great battle, as of THE BLIND GIRL OF WATERLOO.

A PRINCESS'S DISHONOR.

She was a princess, but she fell; and now
Her shame goes blushing through a line of kings!

BARRY CORNWALL

* I conjectured—but without any information to that effect—that this apartment was beneath some portion of the ruins of the chateau of Hougomont, or the farmhouse of La Haye Sainte.

A FRONTIER STORY.

BY D. C. WADE.

It had been one of those perfect days in the latter part of October, which we sometimes have, even after the hoar frosts of autumn have come, to blight and destroy all nature's beauty, and to warn all living creatures to prepare for the approaching winter. The sun had just sank into the western horizon, and even the few last lingering rays, which for a time were discernable upon the high hills and forest tops, had disappeared, and still George Belknap continued to labor without any apparent fatigue, and with as much zeal and activity as if the morning light had just dawned, and his day's work had just commenced.

He was in excellent spirits, for this year the crops everywhere yielded abundantly, and the sight of the large, full ears of his extensive cornfield was sufficient to make any farmer's heart glad, for, from it he expected to realize a handsome profit; and his mind was occupied with the various appropriations he intended to make of the money which he hoped to receive from his summer's produce. And now having beheld him so diligently at work, let us pause for a moment, and go back a little in order to give the reader some insight into his previous history.

George Belknap was a young man of about twenty-six years of age, of a fine form and noble bearing, and with a particularly pleasing countenance, and he was moreover universally beloved and esteemed by all who knew him. He had married Mary Grant, a sweet, tidy, comely maiden, whose only fortune was her pretty face and loving heart; and with that her husband was content, for she made him a most capital helpmate, always keeping his house in perfect order, and discharging her duties in as able and efficient a manner as he did his, and not a happier home than their's could be found in all New England. It was a short time before this, that a general panic had spread throughout the colonies. It was the year 1756, and a war had broken out between England and France, which of course very seriously affected the state of things in this country, and the news had come that the combined French and Indian forces had committed terrible depredations upon our border towns, carrying death and destruction wherever they went. Intense excitement everywhere prevailed. Massachusetts appealed loudly to the courage and patriotism of her sons, urging them to arise in their country's defence, and assist in driving the merciless, blood-thirsty savages and the almost equally ferocious Frenchmen from their borders. George Belknap enlisted at once, with several of his townsmen; but soon the excitement died away. Rumors reached them of suspended hostilities, and of a peace likely to follow; and so much reliance has been placed upon these reports, that for a time the contemplated project of sending an expedition against Fort Niagara had been abandoned, and Gen. Abercrombie deeming further reinforcements unnecessary, very willingly granted permission to those who had already enlisted, and had not yet joined the army, to remain at home, until some fresh outbreak should require their services. This, as well as the bountiful harvests, had served to elevate George Belknap's spirits to a wonderful degree, and he was so occupied with his own thoughts that he did not notice that the sun had set, and that the twilight shadows were fast creeping on, when the loud, shrill notes of the horn, calling him to supper, made him leave his work, and whistling to his dog, he started off in the direction of home. He had just reached the edge of the cornfield, when he turned around, and glancing from one end of it to the other he viewed with evident satisfaction the large amount of labor he had accomplished; when lo! in the very path he had a moment before trodden, he beheld the tall, powerful form of an Indian, standing at a little distance from him, with his keen black eyes fixed full upon him, though no sound escaped his lips. On his brow he wore a coronet of eagle's feathers; a blanket was thrown carelessly over his left shoulder, and with one hand he grasped his uplifted tomahawk, while with the other he pointed significantly, with his fore-finger to a dark-brown-haired scalp, which hung all dripping with blood at his girdle. It was a sight sufficient to make the bravest turn pale, and George Belknap, stout-hearted as he was, stood stupefied with horror and amazement. He stood as if spellbound, with his eyes riveted upon the dusky form before him, and he would gladly have fled, but his limbs seemed suddenly deprived of the power of motion. Not that the sight of an Indian had in itself anything appalling, for in this part of the country they were invariably peaceable, well-disposed towards the whites, and not unfrequently stopped at their dwellings, as they passed to and fro on their hunting excursions, to obtain food and drink. But it must be remembered that signs, dreams and wonders, spectres, visions and ghosts, were household words among our ancestors, and though George Belknap had hitherto ridiculed the whole as idle talk, yet he was not altogether free from the superstitions of his day and generation. Where had the Indian come from, was the question which arose in his mind; he had but a moment before surveyed the whole cornfield, and he knew that no Indian was there then.

Was it an apparition? what else could it be? for no mortal man had been near him all the day; and as that conviction settled itself upon his mind, his knees actually "smote one against the other." Had he been upon the battle-field he would have been undaunted and undismayed; he would have rushed with impetuosity into the deadliest part of the conflict, and would have fought valiantly and manfully, without a thought of fear; but to be all alone, full three-quarters of a mile from home, just when the evening shadows were thickening about him, with an Indian ghost directly before him, was a sight calculated to fill even the bravest heart with consternation and horror, and he sprang with the agility of a panther over the walls, and flew, rather than ran in the direction of home. Fleeter and fleeter grew his steps impelled by fear, as ever and anon he glanced over his shoulder, and beheld the Indian with his uplifted tomahawk hotly pursuing him. Once, he hit his foot against a stone, and stumbled and fell, then the Indian halted for a moment until he had arisen, and the race went on as before. If he slackened his pace, the Indian slackened his also, always keeping just such a distance from him; if he turned from one side of the road, his companion did the same; if he crossed over to the other, the footsteps of his pursuer were still close upon his track.

On and on they sped, and when George reached the house, he was more dead than alive with fatigue and terror. Again he turned round, but the Indian had stopped, and after shaking his tomahawk defiantly at him he vanished like mist before him.

Fortunately his wife was so much engaged in making tea, and taking up the toast and cakes for supper, that she did not particularly notice him, so that by the time he had taken his seat at the table, he had in some degree recovered from his fright and fatigue.

"George, what is the matter?" said his wife, as she passed him a cup of tea; "are you sick? you look dreadfully pale."

"I, I don't know, yes, I believe I am sick. I have a headache," he answered, hardly knowing what he said.

"What can I do for you?" she said quickly, quite alarmed by his looks and manner.

"Nothing at all, dear, all I need is a little quiet and rest, and I shall soon be better."

"Shall I boil you an egg? or will you have some of this toast? I made it expressly for you, and it is unusually nice, or perhaps you had rather have a cracker."

"Neither, Mary, I don't want anything to eat to-night, I am not hungry at all."

"You have been at work too hard, I know you have," said Mary. "I'll go down and see if Mr. Trueman won't let John or Jim come and help you to-morrow, shall I?"

But Mr. Belknap did not answer; he had not even heard her question.

"Wont you have some more sugar or cream in your tea?" said Mary, after the lapse of a few minutes, again trying to draw her husband into conversation.

"O no, it is all right, and very nice," he answered, drinking it more to please her than because he actually wanted it; and then arising from the table, he drew his chair quite close to the fire, and remained silent and motionless as a statue for more than an hour, gazing in upon its bright burning embers; and Mary, perceiving that her husband was not in a conversational mood, wisely concluded to leave him to his own meditations, and proceeded to wash and wipe the tea-dishes, and to put them away. After that, a long silence ensued, which Mary was the first to break.

"George," said she, as she came and sat down by him, "what is the matter? something has happened, I know, for you are not usually so sad and dejected; do tell me what it is, you surely won't exclude me from your confidence."

"Indeed, I will not, Mary," said George, "you deserve it, and you shall have it. The truth is, I have had my warning."

"Your warning?" said Mary in surprise, "what do you mean? you astonish me."

"I mean just what I say," he answered in a very serious tone. "I have received the warning which death always gives to all before they depart."

"And is that all?" and Mary laughed outright. "Really, I thought something dreadful had happened. I feel as if a load was taken from my heart."

"And it is dreadful," said George, in a husky voice, "to be cut off in the very morning of my life, to die, when I have so many to love and to live for, to leave you, my dearest—"

"Stop," said Mary, putting her hand over his mouth, "you must not talk so; who has been putting these silly notions into your head? I thought you were a firm disbeliever in all this sort of nonsense."

"So, I always have been," answered her husband; "but 'facts are stubborn things,' and I can't discredit the evidence of my own eyes," and he proceeded to relate his evening adventures; how an Indian had risen up before him in the cornfield all painted and equipped for battle, how he had ran, and been pursued by him all the way home, always keeping just such a distance from him, and finally just when he had reached his own door, he had shaken his tomahawk defiantly at him, and then disappeared as suddenly as he came.

To all this Mary listened with assumed gravity, though she could scarcely refrain from laughter. She had no faith in visions, presentiments and warnings, which were the favorite topics of conversation at the fireside among our ancestors, and therefore she could not participate in her husband's fears and forebodings.

"George," said she, "I see through the whole affair; this phantom which you have seen, is partly the work of your own imagination; you were at work all alone in the cornfield, and no one to talk to, and your mind was doubtless occupied with those frightful stories of Indian murders and massacres of which we have heard so many of late, and you allowed your thoughts to dwell so long upon them, that your imagination became aroused to such a pitch, that you actually believed that you saw an Indian before you; that was all. I looked out of the window and saw you running as if some evil spirit was after you, but there was n't any Indian, for if there had been, I should have seen him."

"What was invisible to you, might have been visible to me," answered her husband, quietly.

"When I was about twelve years old," said Mary, "my mother had a quilting-party, and just as we were nicely seated at the supper-table, a bird came in at the window, and flew around my head three times, and lit on my shoulder for a moment, and then went off through an open window. Dismay was on every countenance; the old ladies shook their heads, and whispered one to another, 'poor child, she is n't long for this world; it's a dreadful omen, a sure sign of death.' My mother grew pale with terror, and for months after she watched me constantly, daily expecting to see me droop and die. But you see I disappointed them all. I grew tall, and strong, and here I am not quite twenty-one, and haven't scarcely seen a sick day in my life. What do you think of that, George? If the sign proves false in my case, why should it not in yours?"

"You are a most capital reasoner," said Mr. Belknap, affectionately; "you'd do nicely for a lawyer, I hope your argument will prove true."

He did not tell her that it was the scalp, to which the Indian had pointed so impressively, the hair of which was exactly the color of his own, that had affected him more powerfully than anything else.

"This is a disagreeable subject, let us drop it entirely," said Mary; "it never does any good to dwell upon these dark things, and we won't be so foolish as to give way to idle fears, till we have some cause for them. Suppose we sing a little, that will drive away the blues to perfection. O, no, not those solemn things, for you are solemn enough already," she said, seeing him take up the hymn-book; "let us have something lively, some of those good old English ballads, such as your grandfather used to sing, Prince Edward was a famous man, or Robin Hood;" and in another moment the room was filled with the soft, sweet music of her merry melodies; she sang the whole six verses beginning with "Prince Edward was a famous man," but her husband could not join her, a cloud was upon his brow, his mind was filled with dark and sad forebodings of coming evil, he seemed to feel instinctively that a terrible death awaited him, and even the gaiety of his wife could not dispel his gloom.

Just then the clattering of horses' hoofs were heard at the door, and a soldier entered. He had come, he said, addressing Mr. Belknap, to inform him that hostilities had again commenced more alarming than ever; that the rumors of peace were without any foundation, got up and circulated by the French themselves, to blind the eyes of the colonists, until they could have time to complete their preparations for a war, and Gen. Abercrombie had sent him with orders for those who had enlisted, and as many more as he could rally, to join the army without delay. The soldier delivered this message in a rapid and monotonous tone, and with a polite bow he departed, to execute his commands elsewhere, while poor Mary upon whose heart his words had fallen like a thunder-bolt, threw herself into her husband's arms and burst forth into an uncontrollable flood of tears, for now for the first time those terrible apprehensions of some dreadful calamity about to befall them, which had so disturbed and distressed her husband, suddenly took possession of her own soul, and she gave way to her feelings without any attempt to restrain them.

The next morning the sun shone out in all its splendor and beauty; the weather was warm, and pleasant as summer, and the day promised to be all that the previous one had been, and yet upon this morning when all was beautiful, bright and joyous, there was weeping, sorrow and parting; many a heart was oppressed with sadness, many a home was left lonely and desolate, and many were separated from loved ones forever, for in nearly every town in Massachusetts, some could be found who had responded to the call of patriotism and duty, and were about to depart upon a perilous expedition against Fort Niagara.

Already the sharp report of the musketry announced that the time of departure was at hand, and the air resounded with the beating of the drum, and the music of the fife; still George Belknap lingered, he could not tear himself away from his young, beautiful and weeping wife, without a few more expressions of love and tenderness, the last he felt he ever should bestow upon her.

Never before had he looked so handsome as there he stood in the doorway all accoutred and equipped for his campaign, with one arm thrown lovingly around his wife, whom he was seeking to cheer and console. His tall, fine form was drawn up to its full height, his head was proudly erect, and no trace of his previous agitation was visible upon his countenance, his dark brown hair was thrown carelessly off his forehead, his cheek was flushed with excitement, and in his eye there was an unusual brilliancy.

"Mary, my sweet wife," he said, "my heart tells me that I shall never return, for twice last night the same Indian that I saw yesterday has appeared in my dreams, to warn me of my approaching end, but do not mourn or grieve for me, for I give my life a willing sacrifice to my country's cause. Our separation here, my dearest, will be a final one, but remember, Mary, there is a heaven above; thither your steps are tending as well as mine; there we shall meet again to be forever united, and to dwell in those blest mansions of eternal happiness which the Lord has prepared for all who love and serve him." Then followed one long and last embrace, and they parted.

It would be useless to enter upon a detailed account of that perilous expedition undertaken against Fort Niagara, for all the readers of American history must be fully aware that the result was most disastrous to the hopes of the colonists. A dreadful defeat, in which a dreadful loss of life was involved, was followed by a rapid retreat. Indians merciless and blood-thirsty constantly hovered upon the trail of the routed army, concealing themselves in the woods and trees, to cut off any stragglers or small parties of soldiers who should by chance have become separated from the main body of the army, and many fell victims to the unerring aim of their bullets or tomahawks. Among these was George Belknap; he, together with some dozen of his companions, had carelessly fallen in the rear of the army, and were stopping for a few moments to drink from a brook, when suddenly a large party of Indians who were lying in ambush for them, attacked them; taken by surprise as they were, and overpowered by numbers, they could make but a feeble resistance, and fell indiscriminately before the musket-shots and tomahawks of the savages. Only one escaped to tell the tale. Albert Morris a neighbor, and fellow-townsmen of George Belknap, by a singular fleetness of foot was able, under cover of the smoke, to reach the army.

The last he saw of his friend, he had fallen upon the ground, and a tall, powerful Indian, enveloped in a large blanket, with his head adorned with eagle's feathers, rushed upon him, answering the exact description of the one he had solemnly protested had appeared before him, but he saw no more, for at that moment, he was forced to flee to save himself.

The next morning, a small detachment of troops were sent to the spot of the unfortunate encounter. The corpses of eleven men were found, many of them dreadfully mangled, and all had been scalped by the hands of the ruthless savages. Among them was the body of Belknap.

Poor Mary Belknap, her love for her husband had been little short of adoration; he was the light of her life, and upon him were centered all the warm, strong affections of her young heart. In his death a blight had indeed fallen upon her youth and her existence, and all joy and happiness were forever banished from her soul; the elasticity of her step was gone, the bloom faded from her cheek, and the light went out from her mild blue eyes, and she grew daily weaker and more emaciated. The kind-hearted neighbors were touched with compassion at the sight of her grief, and sought by every means in their power to alleviate her sufferings, and to console her in her sorrow. But that insidious disease, consumption, had marked her for its victim. No skill, care or attention could stay the progress of the fell destroyer; she received their attentions gratefully, smiled cheerfully and kindly upon all, but uttered no complaint, and shed no tears; and just as the spring was opening in all its beauty and freshness, all that remained of the young, beautiful and beloved Mary Belknap was consigned to the cold and silent grave.

She had indeed gone to that world where there are no tears, sorrow or parting, there to be united to that loved one who had gone before, and to dwell forever with him amid celestial glories of Paradise. Thus ends my Indian legend.

The Florist.

Who shall say that flowers
Dress not heaven's own bowers?
Who its love without them can fancy—or sweet floor?
Who shall even dare
To say we sprang not there,
And came not down that love might bring one piece of heaven the more?
O, pray believe that angels
From those blue dominions Brought us in their white laps down 'twixt their golden pinions. LEIGH HUNT.

Useful Hints.

Do not forget to take up a few roots of the Diclytra spectabilis for winter flowering. Many persons fail in getting this beautiful plant into flowering in the house—and the secret of it is, keeping the plant too hot at first. Almost any plant will flower sooner, and in more profusion, if kept in a cool greenhouse till it commences growth—and the diclytra requires yet more cool treatment. Let any one follow the following cool directions, and we will ensure them success. Take up the roots, and place in a large pot filled with good rich soil, and leave the plant out until the earth freezes hard enough to almost split the pot; then bring it into the house to a cool room, and by degrees get it accustomed to the heat. This process, singular as it may seem, will ensure a fine plant and a profusion of blossoms. There are some other plants which, though perfectly hardy, add much to the beauty of a collection of indoor plants; these are the deutzia gracilis, daisies, pansies and violets. Soil for potting should also be attended to before frost sets in. Complicated composts, which some writers expatiate upon, are valueless. In our opinion, good maiden loam from an old pasture and a quantity of soil from the deep woods—that which is rather sandy being best—mixed together, will make a compost suitable for almost any plant.

Coltsfoot.

This grows on high, moist, clayey ground, producing yellow flowers, in February and March. The leaves are round, hairy, and close to the ground, supported on long foot-stalks, veined, kidney-shaped, resembling a colt's hoof, of a purple color; the flower stem grows about eight inches high. A decoction of one pound of the dried roots and leaves, boiled to three quarts and a half pint, drank three times a day, is good for scrofula. For a consumptive cough a gill of this may be taken four times a day. It is a warming stimulant, used to promote perspiration, and cannot be given amiss in colds, obstructions, whooping-cough, asthmatic complaints, pain in the breast, and to promote expectoration. A snuff made of the leaves is good for the eyes and head, and the whole plant made into beer is very grateful and medicinal.

Garrya.

A hardy evergreen, introduced only a few years since, and which produced its very handsome long pendulous spikes of blossoms or catkins for the first time in England in October, 1834. These spikes are produced in bunches of eight to ten together; and they are frequently over a foot long. It is quite hardy, and should be grown in a loamy soil, where it will continue flowering all winter in defiance of the cold. It is a striking object, not only from the great abundance of its long, slender, graceful catkins, but from its dark green glassy and leathery leaves. It is readily increased by layers or cuttings struck in sand under a glass.

Thrips.

This is the name given to a species of fly, very small and very destructive among plants both indoors and out. They are very tiny, and seem rather to leap than fly away when touched. They are very destructive, and attack both the leaves and petals, causing both to curl up, and afterwards to turn yellow and drop off. The larvae are nearly as large as the perfect insect, and of a pale yellow color, and the insect itself is at first yellowish, then becomes black. As soon as the ravages of these little creatures are perceived, the plants they have attacked should be well and frequently syringed, and exposed as much as possible to the free air; hand-picking in their case is of very little avail from the very small size of the insect and their extraordinary activity.

Work for the Month.

Bulbs of hyacinths, etc., should be planted in pots—anemones planted in beds. The dead leaves of trees and shrubs should be swept up and laid in heaps to decay for vegetable mould. Dahlias which have been killed by the frost should have their tubers taken up and laid to dry, after which they should be placed in boxes filled with sawdust or malt dust, to preserve them from the frost. Greenhouse plants must be taken in; and those that are left out, covered carefully at night from the frost. Sweep and roll the gravel walks occasionally, and keep the gutter and drains well open and cleared. Half hardy plants should be covered carefully with furze or baskets of wicker-work, over which mats may be thrown in severe frosts.

Ephedra.

The shrubby horse-tail or sea-grape. Very curious small evergreen shrubs, with jointed branches, and apparently without leaves. They grow best in sea-sand, and when pegged down and kept clipped closely, may be made to present the extraordinary appearance of green turf stretching to the very brink of the sea, and even covered by it at full tide. They are used for this purpose, Du Hamel tells us, in Africa, to cover those dry, burning sands, and give the appearance of an English lawn, where not a single blade of grass will grow. The berries are wholesome, and when ripe, taste like mulberries.

Flowers for Winter.

Flowers intended for winter blooming need a season of repose, especially tropical plants, such as geranium, fuchsia, etc., which should be allowed rest from growth during the months of July and August, by almost entirely withdrawing the supply of water. Of course the leaves will fall off, but the plants will be fitted to start into fresh and vigorous growth, as soon as the water is again supplied. Previous to this, the branches of the fuchsia should be pruned in, and water given sparingly at first, increasing the supply, as the young shoots grow.

Tristania.

Australian shrubs, nearly allied to melaleuca, which require a greenhouse in England and here. They are pretty and showy, and should, to flourish well, be grown in sandy peat. They are propagated by cuttings, and very readily strike in sand under a bell-glass.

Siphocampylus.

A suffrutescent plant with red and green tubed-shaped flowers. It is generally kept in the greenhouse, but it is nearly hardy. It should be grown in heath-mould, and is propagated by cuttings, which should be dried a little before planting.

The Housewife.

To preserve Cucumbers.

Take large cucumbers, green and free from seeds; put them into a jar of strong salt and water, with vine-leaves on the top. Set them by the fireside till they are yellow; then wash and set them over a slow fire in alum and water, covered with vine-leaves; let them boil till tender; take them off, and let them stand in the liquor till cold; then quarter them, and take out the seed and pulp; put them in cold spring water, changing it twice a day for three days. Prepare a syrup thus:—To one pound of loaf sugar, half an ounce of bruised ginger, with as much water as will wet it; when it is quite free from scum, put in the juice and rind of a lemon; when quite cold, pour the syrup on the preserves. If the syrup is too thin after standing two or three days, boil it again, and add a little more sugar. A spoonful of mace gives it the West Indian flavor. One ounce of powdered alum is enough for a dozen cucumbers, or a proportionate number of gherkins. Melons may be done in the same manner.

To preserve Green Gages.

Gather the finest you can get, and before they are quite ripe; put at the bottom of a bell-metal pot some vine-leaves; roll your plums in vine-leaves; put alternate layers of plums and vine-leaves till your pot is full; cover them quite with spring water, put them over a very slow fire; when the skin begins to rise, take them off and put them on a sieve to drain; make a syrup with some of the faulty plums, put a pound of sugar to a pound of plums; when the sugar is dissolved and skimmed quite clear, put in your plums and let them boil gently for ten or fifteen minutes; take them off, and let them stand in the pan till quite cold, then put them on again and let them boil very gently for twenty minutes or half an hour; then take them out as free from the syrup as possible, and boil the syrup till it ropes, then pour it boiling over your plums; keep back a pound of the sugar to boil with the plums the last time.—Magna Bonums to be done the same way.

Paste for cleaning Knives.

Make a mixture, one part emery and three parts crocus martis, in very fine powder. Mix them to a thick paste with a little lard or sweet oil. Have your knife-board covered with a thick buff-leather. Spread this paste on your leather to about the thickness of a quarter of a dollar. Rub your knives in it, and it will make them much sharper and brighter, and will wear them out less than the common method of cleaning them with brickdust on a bare board.

To remove Paint from a Wall.

If you intend papering a painted wall, you must first get off the paint, otherwise the paper will not stick. To do this, mix in a bucket with warm water a sufficient quantity of pearl-ash, or potash, so as to make a strong solution. Dip a brush into this, and with it scour off all the paint, finishing with cold water and a flannel.

Omelet.

Six eggs, one gill of cream, two table-spoonfuls of grated ham. Beat the eggs very thick, add gradually the cream and ham, pepper and salt to your taste. Have ready a pan of boiling butter, pour the omelet into it, and fry a light brown. The moment it is done it should be sent to table. Garnish the dish with curled parsley.

To preserve Plums, or any small Fruit.

They must be fresh gathered, put into strong bottles, and just covered with cold water, then well corked with good corks, firmly knocked in, and tied over with strong twine twice, in the manner of soda-water bottles, so that the rarified air shall not move them; the bottles, corks, and all are to be immersed in a saucepan of cold water, with a little hay at the bottom to prevent collision; the bath to be gently heated to 180 degrees by a thermometer; when arrived at the heat, immediately remove all from the fire, and let the bottles of fruit cool in the water; when cold they are done, and will keep any length of time; the air has been forced out through the cork by the heat applied, and cannot re-enter, the external pressure not being sufficient.

To keep Cisterns clear of Insects.

The water of cisterns that are kept covered through the summer soon begins to smell; and if the cover is left open, thousands of "wigglers," the larvae of mosquitoes, appear, and, besides making the water disagreeable, supply an abundance of little blood-suckers to feed upon us during the night, and disturb our slumbers. An easy way to put an end to the "wigglers," is to place a number of small fish—minnows, for example—in the cistern. These will speedily devour the insects, and keep the cistern clear of all such. If a lead pipe is in the cistern, the fish will die in a day or two.

Apricot Jelly.

Take the stones from eighteen ripe fleshy apricots, cut them in thin slices, and put them in a basin, with the juice of three lemons; have ready, boiling, a pint and a half of clarified syrup. Pour it over the apricots, cover the basin with paper, and let them remain till quite cold, then drain the syrup through a napkin; add one ounce and a half of clarified isinglass, half cold. Mix well in, and pour into your mould. The remainder of the apricots would make a very good marmalade.

A Cement for attaching Metal to Glass.

Take two ounces of a thick solution of glue, and mix it with one ounce of linseed oil varnish, and half an ounce of pure turpentine; the whole are then boiled together in a close vessel. The two bodies should be clamped and held together for about two days after they are united, to allow the cement to become dry. The clamps may then be removed.

Gold Lacker.

Put into a clean four-gallon tin one pound of ground turmeric, an ounce and a half of powdered gamboge, three pounds and a half of gum sandrac, three-quarters of a pound of shellac, and two gallons of spirits of wine. After being agitated, dissolved and strained, add one pint of turpentine varnish, well mixed.

Waterproof Coating for Cotton or Linen.

Bolled linseed oil, containing about an ounce of the oxide of manganese, or litharge, to the quart, will make an excellent waterproof coating for cotton or linen cloth. Put on several coats with a brush, and allow each to dry perfectly.

To destroy Crickets.

Mix some powdered arsenic with roasted apple, and put it into the cracks and holes whence the crickets issue. It will effectually destroy them, and cockroaches also.

Imitation Apple Pie.

Take dried pumpkin, and cut it into pieces about the size of a quarter of a small apple; stew it till soft, but not enough to fall to pieces. Add one cupful of currants, or other dried fruit, to pumpkin enough for three pies; mix well, and put on plates the same as apple; then pour on each pie a teaspoonful of sharp vinegar; strew on some sugar, and spice to taste. Put on the upper crust, and bake. A good substitute for apple pie.

Another.—Take ripe pumpkin, cut it in small pieces, and stew until soft enough to break easy with a spoon. Take it up, and add sugar and lemon, or other spice to suit the taste. Bake with or without upper crust.

Minced Pies.

One cup full of finely chopped meat, and two of pickled beets; mix over night, and add spices to suit the taste. Pour on it some West India molasses, and a little good elder vinegar, and let it stand till morning; then add one cup of raisins, one of currants, half a cup of sugar, and hot water enough to make the mass of a proper consistency. Add a teaspoonful of butter to each pie before putting on the upper crust. Equally as good as pies made with apples, and in a scarcity of fruit, is well worth trying.

Recipe for Burns and Scalds.

Take equal parts of olive oil and lime water, which, when well mixed together, forms a beautiful white ointment, which may be spread with a feather upon the part affected, and a thin rag laid over it. Two or three dressings will take out all the fire, after which apply a little healing ointment. Families ought always to have this remedy by them, that it may be applied immediately after the accident, as it very soon gives ease.

Tomato Pie.

Take ripe tomatoes, scald, skin, and take the seeds out. Line the plates with paste, and slice on tomatoes enough to cover each about as thick as you would for a tart; spice with lemon, nutmeg or mace: add a little butter, and cover with a good puff paste; bake well, and you will have a pie good enough for the best man in town.

To make Sausages.

Take eleven pounds of the fillet of nice fresh pork, and ten pounds of chine fat, chop them very finely, and add five ounces of salt, two and a half of black pepper, one and a half ounce of sage, half an ounce of savory, and a little thyme; work this well together. If closely covered, it will keep some weeks in a cool place.

Guinea Fowls.

These birds must be very young, for, being naturally very dry, they are not eatable if more than twelve months old; they are generally larded or barded, and served plain roasted, rather well done. They are trussed like the common fowls, and require nearly three quarters of an hour to roast.

Cooling Drink.

Bake four or six apples without peeling them; when done and quite hot put them in a jug, and pour over them three pints of boiling water; cover the jug over with paper, and when cold it is ready for use; a spoonful of honey or brown sugar added makes it very palatable.

To preserve Eggs.

If you take the eggs as soon as the hen has laid them, and smear the shells with lard or butter, they will keep as good as new-laid eggs for some time.

To preserve Pears.

Take small, rich, fair fruit, as soon as the pips are black; set them over the fire in a kettle, with water to cover them; let them simmer until they will yield to the pressure of the finger; then with a skimmer put them into cold water; pare them neatly, leaving on a little of the stem and the blossom end to the core; then make a syrup of a pound of sugar for a pound of fruit; when it is boiling hot, pour it over the pears, and let it stand until the next day; then drain it off, make it boiling hot, and again pour it over; after a day or two, put the fruit in the syrup over the fire, and boil gently until it is clear; then put it into the jars, or spread it on dishes; boil the syrup thick, then put it and the fruit in jars.

To make Tomato Figs.

Pour boiling water over the tomatoes, in order to remove the skin; then weigh them and place them in a stone jar, with as much sugar as you have tomatoes, and let them stand two days; then pour off the syrup, and boil and skim until no scum rises. Then pour it over the tomatoes, and let them stand two days, as before; then boil and skim again. After the third time they are fit to dry, if the weather is good; if not, let them stand in the syrup until drying weather. Then place on large earthen plates or dishes, and put them in the sun to dry, which will take them about a week; after which pack them down in small wooden boxes, with fine white sugar between every layer.

Tomatoes in a new Style.

The following method of preparing them for the table, we are assured by one who has made the experiment, is superior to anything yet discovered for the preparation of that excellent article:—Take good ripe tomatoes, cut them in slices, and sprinkle over them finely pulverized white sugar, then add claret wine sufficient to cover them. Tomatoes are sometimes prepared in this way with diluted vinegar, but the claret wine imparts to them a richer and more pleasant flavor—more nearly resembling strawberry than anything else.

To pickle Tomatoes.

Always use those which are thoroughly ripe. The small round ones are decidedly the best. Do not prick them as most receipt-books direct. Let them lie in a strong brine three or four days, then put them down in layers in your jars, mixing with them small onions and pieces of horseradish; then pour on the vinegar (cold), which should be first spiced as for peppers; let there be a spice-bag to throw into every pot. Cover them carefully, and set them by in the cellar for a month before using.

To prevent Mildew on Awnings.

Boil the cloth intended for awnings for one hour in a liquor into which has been dissolved one ounce of alum, and the same quantity of blue vitriol, to every four gallons of water. Allow the cloth to dry thoroughly before it is put up. If the awning is up, brush its surface over with a hot liquor of alum and blue vitriol. This will tend to prevent mildew, and render it more durable.

Nice Castor Oil.

One drop of the essence of bitter almonds will communicate an agreeable taste and smell to an ounce of the castor oil of commerce, and will not at all affect its medicinal action. Persons taking this medicine should order it to be thus flavored.

Curious Matters.

The Wonders of Somnambulism.

Henry Ludford, a ferryman, of Troy, New York, hearing a man call "over," arose from his bed, passed down stairs, out of doors, and down the long stairway to his skiff, got in, crossed the river, brought the passenger over who was calling, took his toll out of a quarter, fastened his river boat, took the passenger over in the Mohawk basin boat, and recrossed back again to his station on the island, passed up stairs in the toll-house, where the ferry-men sleep, took the lighted lamp in his hand, passed to his bed and back again to the hatchway, where he stepped off and fell to the floor below, making a great racket and waking up all the rest of the hands, who hastened to see what was the matter, and on inquiry found that Ludford had been sound asleep all this time. Curiously enough, he received but a few slight bruises by his fall. He remembered nothing of what had occurred, and was bewildered when found lying on the floor, and anxious to know how he came there, and ready to swear that he had not been over with a passenger since an early hour in the evening. The change made by him was taken from a table on which the quarter lay. The midnight passenger called attention to the queer conduct of the ferryman, and said he never saw so dumb a chap before.

Vicissitudes of Fortune.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says Lord Lovelace's son and heir, the grandson to whom will go the bulk of the late Lady Byron's large landed property, and who now becomes Baron Wentworth by her death, he, and has for a considerable time past, been working at weekly wages as an artisan in the smiths' department of the Woolwich arsenal. For the son of an earl, and the heir of a barony by writ, this is a unique case. Lord Lovelace's daughter, to whom passes the bulk of Lady Byron's large personal property, is an inheritrix of much of the rare ability of her mother, Ada, the only daughter of Lord Byron.

Patriarchal Turtle.

A woman named Sarah McKisson, residing near Indiana, discovered a land turtle, or terrapin, near her house, the other day, over sixty years of age, bearing the following dates on its back—James Dixon, 1797; James McKisson, 1797; John McKisson, 1818; Thomas Cross, 1818; Robert McKisson, 1829; William McKisson, 1840. Mr. McKisson, who marked it in 1840, is alive and well, and states that it was found but a few rods from where he left it. It had the 10th of August, 1860, added to the other dates on its back, and was turned loose again, as a walking monument to future generations.

Wonderful Child.

In 1791, a child was born at Lubeck, Germany, who at ten months of age spoke distinctly; at twelve learnt the Pentateuch by rote, and at fourteen months was perfectly acquainted with the Old and New Testaments. At two years of age he was as familiar with ancient history as the most erudite authors of antiquity. Sanson and Danville only could compete with him in geographical knowledge; and Cicero would have thought him an "alter ego," on hearing him converse in Latin. This wonderful child, unfortunately, or fortunately for the rest of mankind, died in his fourth year.

The Nations without Fire.

According to Pliny, fire was for a long time unknown to some of the ancient Egyptians; and when Exodus (the celebrated astronomer) showed it to them, they were absolutely in rapture. The Persians, Phœnicians, Greeks, and several other nations, acknowledge that their ancestors were once without the use of fire, and the Chinese confess the same of their progenitors. Pompanius, Moles, Plutarch, and other ancient authors, speak of nations who, at the time they wrote, knew not the use of fire, or had just learned it. Facts of the same kind are also attested by several modern nations. The inhabitants of the Marian Islands, which were discovered in 1551, had no idea of fire. Never was astonishment greater than theirs when they saw it on the descent of Magellan, in one of their islands. At first they believed it was some kind of animal that fixed to and fed upon wood. The inhabitants of the Philippine and Canary Islands were formerly equally ignorant. Africa presents, even in our own day, some nations in this deplorable state.

An ingenious Workman.

Near the fountain of the Pont St. Michael, Paris, a clever and industrious mechanic has just commenced exhibiting a collection of monuments executed in wood, on a very large scale, which is the result of the most extraordinary labor and skill. There are the splendid cathedral of Milan, the palaces of the Louvre and the Tuileries, the Hotel-de-Ville, of Paris, the Dome of the Invalides, St. Peter's at Rome, the English Houses of Parliament, the Church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, the palace of the Luxembourg, the Church of St. Etienne-da-Mont, and fifty other remarkable European buildings.

Coal Bed on Fire.

A coal bed between Wild Cat Bluff, on the Trinity, and Mound Prairie, Texas, which has been burning slowly for a number of years, has during the recent dry season made wonderful progress, and ten or twenty acres have been burned off, and the fire is progressing rapidly. Recently, on a gentleman and lady riding near it, the horses broke through the crust of earth which covers the fire near the edge, and were severely burned before they could get out.

A new Idea.

In the official report of the California Mint, the following passage occurs, which illustrates some of the many singular phases of social life on the Pacific!—"Half dimes, three cent pieces, coppers and nickels are unknown in our commerce, and are almost unknown in our mint, although a few half-dimes were once issued, to the great indignation of some people, who consider them a dangerous innovation, as having a tendency to reduce the price of labor and the profits of trade."

Magic Pictures.

Magic pictures have been heard of which, when viewed in a certain point through a lens, exhibit an object perfectly different from that seen by the naked eye. Nicorom tells us that he executed at Paris, and deposited in the library of the Malmes, a picture of this kind. When seen by the naked eye, it represented fifteen portraits of Turkish Sultans; but when viewed through the glass, it was a portrait of Louis XIII! This is as wonderful as the stereoscope.

What will a Glass of Water hold?

It is generally thought that when a vessel is full of water any solid substance immersed in it will cause it to overflow—and such will be the case if the substance is not soluble in the water; but the philosophic truth, that in dissolving a body you do not increase the volume of the solvent, may be proved by a simple and interesting experiment. Saturate a certain quantity of water at a moderate heat with three ounces of sugar; and when it will no longer receive, there is room in it for two ounces of salt of tartar; and after that for an ounce and a drachm of green vitriol, nearly six drachms of nitre, the same quantity of sal ammoniac or smelling salts, two drachms and a scruple of alum, and a drachm and a half of borax; when all these are dissolved in it, it will not have increased in volume.

A novel Capture.

The engineer of a locomotive plying on the Central Railroad, New York, captured a large hawk a few days since in rather a novel manner. The hawk, while crossing the railroad, was struck by the smoke-pipe of the engine and brought down. It received no further injury than a stunning blow, and was captured by the engineer as his lawful prey, and has been adopted as a pet by the captor. The bird is not confined, but is gravely perched on the engine, resisting the approaches of all persons excepting the engineer, from whom it receives many kind attentions, which it acknowledges in a way that proves that even senseless birds are not without grateful instincts.

Singular Fact.

Frank Varnum, the only individual saved from the brig Mary Pierce, lately wrecked, in his statement of the circumstances, says that he kept his place on the wreck by thrusting his knife into a worm-eaten spot upon the keel, and holding on. "A gentleman now visiting this city," says the Newport News, "informs us that he was one of the crew of that ill-fated vessel during a portion of 1859; that in July of that year she was hauled into dock in London and coppered, and the very place which was the means of saving Varnum's life purposely left uncoppered, it being the design at some future time to replace it with a sound piece of wood."

Death from a Spider Bite.

A little son of Charles Gott, of East Lancashire, aged five years, died lately from the bite of a spider. The little fellow awoke in the night crying, and on his parents seeking the cause of his grief, they found a small black spider was biting the calf of his leg, and appeared to be sinking itself into the flesh, where it hung very tenaciously till removed. The leg swelled to a very large size, and his sufferings increased till they terminated in death, about forty-eight hours after he was bitten.

A remarkable Fish.

A sea-monster has been taken in the salmon weirs on the river Bride, weighing fourteen hundred weight. The head resembles that of a calf, the body of a darkish gray, with four webbed feet. None of the fishermen can give the name of the animal.

Origin of a Phrase.

Before the introduction of carpets, to cover the floor with straw or rushes was deemed so necessary a point of courtesy, that when not performed, it was said that the host did not care a rush or a straw for his guest; hence the origin of the expression common now.

A curious Case.

A sickly girl in Plymouth, N. H., a somnambulist with a strong propensity to walk off with things and hide them where they could not be found, nor she herself remember, so that at last it was found necessary to lock her in securely at night, made off, a few weeks since, with a valuable watch. Then the family gave her liberty, and watched her movements in hope that the same somnambulist that carried it off would again find it. The other night she started out, followed by her brother. She walked places that he dared not follow; but the moonlight helped show her course, and he kept along. Finally she walked up the trunk of an old tree that hung at an angle of forty-five degrees over a brook, stood firmly at the end while the tree swayed beneath her, and stooping down brought out that watch. Returning to terra firma the brother waked her, took the property, and hurried home.

Shakespeare's Will.

Shakespeare's will is tied up in one sheet with those of Milton and Napoleon, and may be seen at Doctors' Commons, London. In the will of the Bard of Avon is an interlineation of his own handwriting:—"I give unto my wife my brown best bed with the furniture." It is proved by William Byrd, July 22, 1616. The will of the minstrel of Paradise is a noncupative one, taken by his daughter, the great poet being blind. That of Napoleon is signed with a bold hand; the codicil, on the contrary, written shortly before his death, exhibits the then weak state of his body.

A Pair of Eccentrics.

Mr. Day, the eccentric founder of Fabrics Fair, had a housekeeper who had lived with him for thirty years, and was equally eccentric. She had two strong attachments—one to her wedding-ring and garments, the other to tea. When she died, Mr. Day would not permit her ring to be taken off. He said, "If that was attempted, she would come to life again;" and directed that she should be buried in her wedding suit, and a pound of tea in each hand—and these directions were literally obeyed.

Singular Customs.

Among the curious customs in the regions of Central Africa, visited by Captain Burton, are the following:—When twins are born one is put to death. Archery is the only education given to children. A wife is bought for from four to ten cows. When a chief is buried, three pretty women are buried with him. Male criminals are clubbed, speared, or beheaded; females are impaled. When a man is in want, he objects not to sell his family.

A Gormandiser.

There was caught, says the Banffshire (Scotland) Journal, the other day, by one of the boats belonging to Port Gordon, a large eel, which, on being opened, was found to contain eleven full-grown herring, quite fresh, besides a great many that were beginning to undergo decomposition, also seven half-grown crabs—a very fair take in for his codship, and sufficient to have served him on a pretty long voyage.

A lucky Hit.

A Montreal schoolmaster, somewhat of an enthusiast in the science of geology, has recently made a good hit, by which he pockets the sum of $200,000. He took a lease of a tract of land near Acton, on the Grand Trunk Railroad, upon which a little copper ore had been picked up by the farmer who owned it. Setting to work, he soon developed a magnificent copper mine, which has just been sold for $500,000, of which he receives $200,000.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE NEAPOLITAN BOURBONS.

The dynasty of Spanish Bourbons, just now expelled so ignominiously, has afflicted the southern parts of Italy for more than a hundred years. It was in 1735 that the child of Philip, first French King of Spain (Louis XIV.'s grandson), took by force of arms the Kingdom of Naples from the Hapsburg Emperor of Germany, together with Sicily, which the treaty of Utrecht had bestowed on the house of Savoy; but it was not until 1759 that this century of miserable tyranny began. The first King Ferdinand, with his consort, the Austrian Caroline, "unsexed and filled with direct cruelty" as she was, was twice cast out of Naples, and twice enabled, by the forces of his allies, to recover it. The savage Ferdinand I. was followed in 1825 by his son, the hypocrite and profligate Francis I., and he, in 1830, by the late Ferdinand II., whom we remember but too well, and who was succeeded last year by the present Francis, last King of the Two Sicilies. So that four bad sovereigns, in direct descent, with an ominous alternation of names of Ferdinand and Francis, have inflicted on the fair Italian provinces they owned, a dreadful course of maltreatment and unmitigated misrule.

A CONVERTED PUGILIST PREACHING.—Mr. Richard Weaver, a Staffordshire miner, formerly a noted pugilist, known by the name of "Undaunted Dick," because he was never beaten, is now preaching with great success at the Victoria Theatre, London.

THE USE OF HISTORY.—People may say what they please of the practical utility of history, an intimate acquaintance with it is a sure preservative from being deluded into hope by many an ignis fatuus.

MONACO.—The small Italian principality of Monaco has been finally placed under the protection of France, but for diplomatic reasons the treaty will not be published at present.

REVIVAL IN WALES.—As the fruit of the revival in Wales within the last year, some 38,000 persons have professed Christ.

MARVELS OF THE MICROSCOPE.

Lenwenhoeek tells us of animated insects seen with the microscope, of which twenty-seven millions would only be equal to a mite. Insects of various kinds are observable in the cavities of a common grain of sand. Mould is a forest of beautiful trees, with the branches, leaves, flowers and fruit fully discernible. Butterflies are fully feathered. Hairs are hollow tubes. The surface of our bodies is covered with scales like a fish; a single grain of sand would cover 150 of these scales; and a single scale covers 500 pores; yet through these narrow openings the sweat exudes like water through a sieve; how minute then must be its particles! The mite makes five hundred steps in a second. Each drop of stagnant water contains a world of animated beings, swimming with as much liberty as whales in the sea. Each leaf is a colony of insects grazing on it like oxen in a meadow.

THE VALUE OF CORN.—It has been well said, that a single year's crop of corn is worth more than all the gold of California. In addition to its other uses, it is now found that it produces a clear fluid, that burns without odor, without smoke, and is inexpensive, affording a good light in an ordinary kerosene lamp for half a cent an hour. The corn-oil is as clear and colorless as water.

CONDEMNING OUR FELLOWS.—It is a practice entirely too prevalent in this queer world that we inhabit, to condemn the performances of others, when we know that the task could not be better accomplished by ourselves.

THE MINIE RIFLE BALL.—Recent experiments show that a Minie rifle ball, which will pass through a thick board, or a bag of oakum, at a distance of 500 yards, is flattened into a shapeless mass in a bag of sand, at 300 yards.

GREAT CITIES.—There are fifty-seven cities in the world which contain from 100,000 to 200,000 inhabitants, twenty-three from 200,000 to 500,000, and twelve which contain above 500,000.

ERRANDS OF A MANIAC.

About a year since, a gentleman in Wisconsin became insane, and was sent to the Lunatic Asylum in that State. He was a physician of superior cultivation and of remarkably prepossessing appearance, about thirty years old. A few weeks ago he escaped, and went to Chicago. There he encountered a friend who loaned him quite a sum of money, having no suspicion of insanity. He supplied himself with new and elegant clothing and started for La Porte, Indiana, where he remained long enough to win the affections of a young and wealthy widow, and was married to her. During the brief courtship, he exhibited no indications of lunacy, but shortly after his marriage he commenced acting in a manner which startled and shocked his wife and her friends. Among other fancies he believed he was a sheep, and insisted upon crawling on his hands and feet, bleating in the most absurd manner. He would then fancy himself a rattlesnake, and make frantic attempts to bite the members of his household. The unhappy lady, at length worn out with watching him and endeavoring to restore his reason, made preparations to send him to the asylum at Indianapolis; but his insanity sharpened his wits, and he adroitly escaped.

He then went to Syracuse, where he actually purchased a block of buildings. The papers were made out, and he was to call the next day with the money. He was to pay an outrageous sum for the property, and the parties with whom he bargained chuckled vastly. But they saw no more of him. The lunatic started westward. At Buffalo he bargained for an immense amount of corn, to be delivered in New York, and then proceeded to Cleveland. There he endeavored to negotiate for some real estate, but talked so absurdly, that the parties with whom he had interview refused to treat with him. Meanwhile his friends, and particularly his wife in Wisconsin (for he has a wife and two children in that State), were making every effort to ascertain his whereabouts. They traced him to Syracuse, and from thence to Cleveland, but he had already gone from there, and was finally captured at Adrian, Michigan. When not in his rabid fits, few would discover the unfortunate man's true condition. He would make very absurd propositions, and offer exorbitant sums of money for property that hit his fancy; but he would do so in so candid and captivating a manner, as in most cases to disarm suspicion.

THAT'S SO.—Gilded roofs and silver door-locks cannot shut out sleepless nights.

ASKING A BLESSING.

It is related that, on a certain occasion, an English ship of war touched at one of the ports of the Sandwich Islands, and that the captain gave a dinner to the royal family of the islands and several chiefs. The table was spread upon the quarter-deck, and loaded with viands and delicacies of all kinds. After the company were seated around it, and the covers were removed, and everything appeared ready for operations to commence, the islanders seemed to be in no haste to begin, but looked as though something more was expected. The captain thought that the trouble was with the food, and that it was not what they liked, or that it had been prepared in a manner to which they were not accustomed, and accordingly commenced apologizing for the fact. He had, however, a pious waiter, who stood behind his chair, and who was quick to discover where the obstacle was; and who, whispering to the captain, said: "These persons are waiting for a blessing to be asked." "Ask it, then," said the captain. The waiter did so—reverently and gratefully implored the Divine benediction. No sooner was this done, than Queen Pomare, her family, and the chiefs, soon showed by the manner they attacked the provisions, that it was not because the dinner did not suit them, or that they had no appetites, that they had previously refrained from eating, but because no one had "said grace."

WELL TO REMEMBER.—Any persons residing in any part of the country, having sheet music, magazines, newspapers, or serial works of any kind, which they desire to have neatly bound, have only to address them to this office, enclosing directions, and hand the package to the express. The works will be bound in the neatest manner, and at the lowest rates, and returned in one week. Godey's Magazine, Harper's New Monthly, Harper's Weekly, Peterson's Magazine, Atlantic Monthly, London Illustrated News, Punch—in short, all and every serial work is bound as above.

PORCELAIN MANUFACTURES.—The manufacture of porcelain is now being carried on in South Carolina; $50,000 worth has been produced at Kaolin the past year, and the company are enlarging their works.

FOLDING MACHINE.—A folding machine that will fold and pack fifteen hundred printed sheets per hour, casting off bad sheets at the same time, is in operation at Washington.

THE TROTTER HORSE.

The Trotter, says Porter's Spirit of the Times, is an American institution, peculiar to the country, expressive of the taste of the people, and fully up to the accomplishment of the popular desire. He stands between the race horse and the dray horse, exactly as the middle class of England stands between the peer and the lower grade of English society. England has never been able to compete with us in trotting time; and though we extract our best trotters from pure-blooded horses, still the mother country, with all her great advantages in that respect, has never been able to produce a Flora Temple, a Patchen, or a Lady Suffolk. We succeed because we train for the purpose, devoting money, time, and strict study to the incipient movements of the horse; and every characteristic of action and temper is noted with conscientious care. Some years ago, an English gentleman sent to a friend in New York an order to purchase a fast roadster for him, and Alexander, a horse not equal in reputation to his illustrious namesake, was sent over, and a trial made with him, which resulted in his utter disgrace. But Wheelan happened to be in England at the time with Rattler and Ripton, trotting and winning horses, and Alexander being recognized by him, he immediately induced the owner to enter him for a stake at Manchester, with four or five of the best trotters in England, Wheelan engaging to train and ride the horse. When Alexander came upon the ground, the odds were four and five to one against him, but he won the race by a quarter of a mile. Wheelan said that he took the track at starting and widened the gap easily, and near the finish, being surprised that no horse was anywhere near him, and fearing that a great brush was intended by one of the enemy, he plied the steam on, and landed his horse a quarter of a mile ahead of the field. So happy was the owner of Alexander, that he gave, Wheelan a gold time watch and other presents, and sent to his exporters in New York a handsome service of silver.

A SHORT REIGN.—The runaway king of Naples, Francis II., began his reign May 22, 1859—yet he filled the throne too long at that.

HAVANA.—Highway robbers are getting bold in their operations at Havana. The Cubanos need another Tacon.

A NEW COLOR.

An art writer says—During the past ten days though the warm weather still continues, the change of color in the dresses which may be seen in Broadway, is as marked as the change which may be seen in the vegetable kingdom. Every one who is not so unfortunate as to be afflicted with color blindness, must have been made conscious of the incoming of a new tint, this season in the world of fashion. A color of peculiar brilliancy must have been noticed in the show windows of milliners and dry goods dealers, flustering from ladies' bonnets, spotting their dresses, edging their handkerchiefs, and now and then tied in very narrow strips around the throats of dressy young men. Last year this lovely has raged in England and was domesticated in France, and occasional glimpses were had of it in Broadway. But now an eruption of it, like scarlet fever, has broken out on this side of the Atlantic. The French call this new tint rose from its resemblance to the marsh mallow, which it does not much resemble, its nearest vegetable relative, in point of color, being a boiled beet; but the true name of it is Perkins's Purple, so called after the English chemist who first succeeded in extracting it from coal tar.

THE DANGERS OF SCIENCE.

Some years ago, a whale was caught at the Nore and brought to the Isle of Dogs. Mr. Clift, in his eagerness to examine the internal parts of the mouth, stepped inside the mouth, between the lower jaws, where the tongue is situated. This tongue is a huge spongy mass, and being at that time exceedingly soft, from exposure to air, gave way like a bog; at the same time he slipped forward towards the whale's gullet, nearly as far as he could go. Poor Mr. Clift was really in a dangerous predicament; he sank lower and lower into the substance of the tongue and gullet, till he nearly disappeared altogether. He was short in stature, and in a few seconds would doubtless have lost his life in the horrible oily mass, had not assistance been quickly afforded him. It was with great difficulty that a boat-hook was put in requisition, and the good little man hauled out of the whale's tongue.

SINGULAR.—The coffins used for the burial of young persons in Brazil, are either red, scarlet or blue; older people alone are carried to the grave in black coffins.

CURIOSITY.—Curiosity is little more than another name for hope.

A CURIOUS SWISS CUSTOM.

When a girl has arrived at a marriageable age, the young men of the village assemble by consent on a given night at the gallery of the chalet in which the fair one resides. This creates no matter of surprise in the mind of her parents, who not only wink at the practice, but are never better pleased than when the charms of their daughter attract the greatest number of admirers. Their arrival is soon announced by sundry taps at the different windows. After the family in the house has been roused (for the scene usually takes place at midnight, when they have all retired to rest), the window of the room prepared for the occasion, in which the girl is first alone, is opened. Their parley commences, of rather a hoisterous description; each man in turn urges his suit with all the eloquence and art of which he is possessed. The fair one hesitates, doubts, asks questions, but comes to no decision. She then invites the party to partake of a repast of cakes and kirschwassar, which is prepared for them on the balcony. Indeed this entertainment, with the strong water of the cherry, forms a prominent feature in the proceedings of the night. After having regaled themselves for some time, during which, and through the window, she has made use of all the witchery of woman's art, she feigns a desire to get rid of them, and will sometimes call her parents to accomplish this object. The youths, however, are not to be put off, for, according to the custom of the country, they have come here for the express purpose of compelling her on that night, there and then, to make up her mind, and to declare the object of her choice. At length, after further parley, her heart is touched, or at least she pretends that it is, by the favored swain. After certain preliminaries between the girl and her parents, her lover is admitted through the window, where the affiance is signed and sealed, but not delivered, in presence of both father and mother. By consent of all parties, the ceremony is not to extend over a couple of hours, when, after a second jollification with kirschwassar, they all retire—the happy man to bless his stars, but the rejected to console themselves with the hope that at the next tournament of love-making they may succeed better. In general, the girl's decision is taken in good part by all, and is regarded as decisive.

ONLY THINK OF IT.—If the United States and its territories were as thickly populated as Great Britain, they would contain 750,000,000 of people, a number nearly equal to the whole population of the globe.

POMPEY'S STATUE.

The special travelling correspondent of the Christian Watchman and Reflector in his closing letter from Rome, thus speaks of a memorable work of art:

In one of the palaces, of which the city is full, and which generally contain more or less of art, I saw the statue of Pompey, which is now almost universally supposed to be the identical one at the base of which "great Cæsar fell," at the hands of Brutus and his associate assassins. For centuries the existence of this statue was unknown; but subsequently it was discovered, exhumed, and brought to light. It had only lost one arm, which has been restored. It is identified both by its form and the place of its discovery, which corresponds with the statements made in history as to the locality in which it was last left. It is unquestionably an antique, and is worthy to have been that of the illustrious Pompey. It is most dignified and noble in its port, bearing the aspect of a god rather than a mortal. Its right arm is extended as if in command. It was a fitting ornament of the place it occupied, as it has a countenance and bearing realizing our highest ideas of Roman valor and dignity. My sensations were peculiar, as I gazed at it, and thought of what it had witnessed. To that noble form the haughty Cæsar clung when pierced by many wounds, and upon its base the blood of foul conspiracy flowed. There are those who pretend that some red stains upon one of the limbs of the figure were made by the blood shed upon that occasion; but this is hardly credible, especially as the statue was buried for many years. This glorious work of ancient art narrowly escaped destruction during the bombardment of the city by the French in 1849. I hope this statue will be preserved to the end of time.

IGNORANCE.—Ignorance is often the source of the most intrepid action, and the most implicit faith—since there are none so fearless as those who have not light enough to see their danger, and none so confident as they who have not sufficient knowledge to discern their own errors.

ATROCIOUS.—At a recent festive meeting, a married man, who ought to have known better, proposed—"the ladies," as "the beings who divide our sorrows, double our joys, and treble our expenses."

A RACY REMARK.—Persons who sport money at races are likely to come into connection with good company, or, at all events, they are consually with their bettors.

MODERATION IN EATING.

The statistics of food show that an American consumes more aliment than a citizen of any other nation on the face of the globe. That all Americans are able to do so, speaks volumes in favor of the prosperity of the country. But the question arises, whether we do not abuse the plenty that reigns throughout our favored land?—whether we do not eat too much?—and medical gentlemen are apt to tell us that we do. We are rather afraid that gluttony is a national sin. One of the conditions of attaining a long life, is moderation in eating. The famous Cornaro, who lived to an hundred by a strict observance of the laws of health, has bequeathed us some important rules for our conduct in this matter. First, we must lead, said he, a sober life; a sober life is a life of order, of rule, and of temperance. We must not eat so much as will unfit the mind for its usual exertions. We must not pass suddenly from one extreme to another, but change slowly and cautiously. We must eat plain and wholesome food. We must proportion the quantity to the age and strength of the eater, and the kind of food used. We must never allow the appetite for food or drink to regulate the quantity we take; that is, we must always eat under satiety. This kind of sobriety made Cornaro a new kind of man, and the wonder of his age. "From it," he cries fervidly, "spring, as from a root, life, health, cheerfulness, bodily industry, and mental labor. Laws divine and human favor it. From it, like clouds from the sky, fly repletions, indigestions, gluttonies, superfluities, humors, distempers, fevers, griefs, and the perils of death."

To ascertain how long a man can live, the learned reason from analogy. The duration of life with the horse, and with other animals of the higher species, is proportionate to the time expended in their growth. The learned and ingenious Flowrens has improved on the working out of this idea suggested by Buffon. All the larger animals, he observes, live five times as long as the time expended by them in reaching maturity.

The camel grows for 8 years, and lives	40
The horse " 5 " "	25
The ox " 4 " "	15 or 20
The lion " 5 " "	20
The dog " 2 " "	10 or 12
The man " 20 " "	100 or more.

By a physical analogy, therefore, the ordinary life of a man should be 100 years, at least. Now, if any of our readers wish to attain the respectable age of a century, let them combine Cornaro's rules for diet with Dr. Windship's rules for physical exercise, and live faithfully up to them.

A GOOD MOVE.

Mr. John D. Philbrick, Superintendent of Public Schools, devotes a large portion of his semi-annual report to the subject of physical training. He thinks it ought to form a large part of our educational system. "I am not prepared," he says, "to recommend at present any material change in the existing provisions of our system for the protection of health in schools. The regulations respecting vacations, sessions, recesses, studies, and home lessons, are not the hasty product of a day. They are the fruit of wisdom and experience. They are good in the main, and should not be changed without careful deliberation. It does not seem to me that the desired result is to be attained merely by shortening the sessions, or by reducing the standard of scholarship. The principal remedy which I would suggest, is the introduction into all grades of our schools, of a thorough system of physical training, as a part of the school culture. Let a part of the school time of each day be devoted to the practice of calisthenic and gymnastic exercises in which every pupil shall be required to participate. I fully agree with an able author, who has thoroughly studied this subject, that 'a universal course of training of this kind, scientifically arranged and applied, in connection with obedience to other laws of health, might, in one generation, transform the inhabitants of this land from the low development now so extensive, to the beautiful model of the highest form of humanity.'"

IMPROVING THE TEXT.—A young Thespian was once entrusted to deliver the following message to Lord Randolph in the play: "My lord, the banquet waits." But having lost the run of the sentence, he called out, amid the roars of the audience—"Mr. Randolph, your supper has been ready for some time." Another actor, playing in "Joan of Arc," and having to announce the arrival of the heroine's father, said: "Miss Ark, here comes old Mr. Ark."

WEALTH OF PHILADELPHIA.—The real and personal property of Philadelphia amounted to $300,000,000—the assessed value half as much.

POETRY.—Poetry is to philosophy what the Sabbath is to the rest of the week.

RATHER SEVERE.—Austria taxes her Venetian provinces sixty per cent.

TANTALIZING.—They have been raising a second crop of strawberries in Virginia.

POPULAR CREDULITY.

There is scarcely any length to which popular credulity will not go. Many people believe that Colt, who was hanged for murder in New York, is still alive. There are some people who still stick to it that Hicks the pirate was resuscitated after his execution on Gibbet Island, in New York. The ridiculous story of the existence of the French dauphin in the person of an Indian preacher, found many firm believers. History is full of the records of impostors who have been successful for a time by exploiting the gullibility of the masses. When the two princes were murdered in the Tower of London by the order, it was supposed, of the Duke of Gloucester, afterward Richard III. of England, there were numerous dynastic and party interests which made it important to spread abroad the report that one of these, Edward, Duke of York, and heir to the throne, was not killed. It was given out that he had been rescued and carried away secretly into Scotland. An individual named Perkin or Peter Warbeck, was procured to personate the defunct. He came to England and laid claims to the crown. Margaret, the Duchess of Burgundy, the aunt of the murdered princes, who must have known them as intimately as she did her own children, maintained the identity of Warbeck with the young Duke of York. Hundreds of others, who knew Edward familiarly, and who must have seen him a thousand times at the court of his father, Edward IV., testified to the same effect; and a large party was formed to assert by arms his pretensions to the throne. Landing in Cornwall, he was joined by a powerful band of insurgents. He besieged the town of Exeter, but when the army of Henry VII. came against him, his courage deserted him, and he fled to the sanctuary of Beaulieu Abbey. False promises of pardon, however, induced him to leave his retreat, and he was then seized, carried to the Tower and hanged, drawn and quartered. Henry the VII. published a confession which this youth was said to have made, in which he gave his name as Warbeck, or Osbec, and said he was the son of a converted Jew of Tournay; yet for a long time his story was believed, and down to a late period historians gravely argued its probability. The finding of the bones of the murdered prince, buried somewhere near the steps of the Tower, finally put an end to speculation on the subject.

Another instance quite as remarkable as this, came to light in Russia during the sixteenth century. A young son of Ivan the Terrible, during the reign of his elder brother, Feder, was put to death in the town of Uglitch. He was found in his blood, and the knife with which he had been playing in his throat. His murderers were pointed out by his mother, and the populace of the town inflicted a fierce revenge upon them; but ample testimony was adduced by others to show that Demetrius, for that was the prince's name, died by accident. While the conflicting reports were yet circulating, a person appeared in Luthianda who asserted that he was the young prince, that he had escaped the hands of assassins, and that he desired the restoration of his name and rights. Many of the most distinguished nobles espoused his cause, the Palatine of Sandomir gave him his daughter in marriage, an expedition against Moscow was set on foot by his followers, the strongest cities voluntarily opened their gates to him, he vanquished some of the leading Russian generals, and he entered the capitol in triumph. He was finally crowned, amid the acclamations of the people, as the Czar of Russia. The mother of the murdered prince acknowledged the identity of the new czar and her lost son; he reigned in peace for some years, when his irregularities provoked the people, and he was butchered in a moment of insurrectionary fury. The origin of this Demetrius is still involved in the greatest obscurity.

A PROMISING BOY.—They have a nice, well-grown boy named Joseph True Lake, at Chicester, Vermont, who, if he is not suddenly stunted by some accident, will be a man one of these days. The delicate juvenile is eight years old, standing four feet seven inches in his stockings, measuring four feet two and a half inches around his waist, and weighing 237 pounds.

ONLY THINK OF IT.—In the last three years one hundred tons of wire have been used per week in the manufacture of ladies' skirts, and the material used for this article of dress has cost yearly $1,464,060.

HAPPINESS.—Happiness in part is imaginary, and its possession depends almost entirely upon ourselves; contentment is the key which unlocks the treasure house, and with "godliness is great gain."

A MONSTER CAGED.—John Swartz was sent to prison in Philadelphia, for lifting up a boy 4 years old, and dashing his head on the pavement, without provocation.

THE PINEAPPLE.—This delicious fruit is now successfully raised in Florida, proving hardier and more profitable than the banana.

Of the children born in Scotland during the second quarter of 1860, 2494 were illegitimate—8.5 per cent of the whole number born, or one in every 11.3. In England, in the latest return (1858), the proportion was less by a fourth.

The London correspondent of the Scottish Guardian says: "To show how London example and influence act, I may mention that there is now a ragged school about to be established at Cairo, Egypt, for Moslem children."

Cialdini, the Italian general, is said to be no less an artist than a soldier. It is reported that he has been a long time a welcome guest in the salons of Americans sojourning in Italy, among not the least of whom, Charlotte Cushman may be named.

Showers of frogs have frequently been mentioned as having taken place, but Liege (says an English paper) was recently visited with a shower of a different kind—one of ants. An immense number of these insects fell on the town, and penetrated into all the apartments wherever the windows were open.

The Press Medicale Belge states that, in Tonquin and Cochinchina, hydrophobia is cured with complete success by decoction of the leaves of Datura Stramonium, or Thorny Apple. A violent paroxysm of rage ensues, which lasts but a short time, and the patient is cured in the course of 24 hours.

Paris was astonished not long since by the sight of a carriage, propelled neither by steam nor gas, going with such amazing swiftness as to leave far behind the four-in-hand carriages of the Jockey Club, which endeavored in vain to keep up with it. The inventor is said to be a poor man, who has constructed the vehicle entirely himself, and will not disclose the secret until he is properly secured by patents.

Of the eighteen Princes of Wales, eleven have lived to reign in England.

Michelet has nearly ready for the press a new volume, L'Enfant.

In London, recently, twenty-two pictures of the choicest kind, from the Belvidere collection, were sold by auction, and brought the sum of $125,000.

Of the two young ministers on trial who were stricken from the list of the English Wesleyan Conference, one incurred that penalty by jilting the lady to whom he had been engaged.

The American missionaries who lately visited the Chinese Camp at Loo Choo, report that the tents were made of Massachusetts drills, and bore the stamp of the manufacturer still upon them.

It is proposed to erect 400 public drinking-fountains (the water to be filtered) in London, to counterbalance the 10,000 places for the sale of intoxicating drinks.

Pieces of hemp rope which have been fished up from the wreck of the Royal George, at Spithead, after a century of submergence, have been found perfectly sound, and they are said to have actually retained the smell of the tar.

A copy of the "Bay Psalm Book," the first book printed in British America, at Cambridge, Mass., has been sold in England, to a private individual, for one hundred and fifty guineas, a sum exceeding $750.

A Mr. Richardson, of Ireland, lately attempted to get off the cars of the Dublin and Kingstown railway when they were in motion. The railway company prosecuted him, and had him fined £3, as a warning to others.

Garibaldi asked one of our naval officers, who lately saw him in Sicily, if the people of this country understood him and his cause. "I am doing," said he, "what your fathers did in 1775 to 1782."

A small brass cannon has been found at the bottom of a deep well of the Castle de Cluey, in France, with the date of 1258 upon it. The date of the invention of cannon has historically been assigned to the year 1324, 66 years later.

The lazzaroni of Naples are divided into two political parties—the Retrogrades and Liberals, haunting distinct quarters. The Liberals have now petitioned to be no longer called lazzaroni, but popolani.

An Italian journal, the Trovatore, states that the number of professional singers of both sexes now in Italy amounts to 1730. This aggregate is composed of 410 prime donne, 330 tenors, 280 baritones, 160 basses, 50 buffos, etc. In addition to these, Italy has 1670 dancers, male and female.

Strong beer is one of the most important articles in the commissary department of the British army, especially in India, where it is supposed to be the best means of preserving health. It has hitherto been exported from England, but an experiment has recently been successfully made in brewing it in India, which has excited much interest in England, and was made the subject of a leader in the Times.
